About two weeks ago, he quietly brought his influence to bear on the recruiting-station, in the basement of Odd Fellows' Hall, in Washington street, Hoboken. Col. Iiges, a regular officer of the 14th U. S. infantry, took charge. Every day men known to be bounty jumpers were enlisted to the number of two or three to three or four per day, and allowed to escape out of the back of the building. The jumpers, with the bounty in their pockets, went to their friends, and bragged that they had a "soft thing" in Hoboken; they had been over and got their "walk-away." Brokers known to control "jumpers" were allowed peculiar facilities for getting in men. Before the end of a week there were a crowd of a hundred or two before the door, sometimes asking to be enlisted, and urging favored brokers to give them a chance. They were told that arrangements were not made for taking in many yet, but they would be more perfected, so that they could take in any number. On Friday, the "arrangements" were perfected.

It was estimated that in the morning there were a crowd of nearly 1,500 there. They were taken inside to be enlisted with an exceeding rapidity. They all came from New York, but were men of such cheerful dispositions, that the strict guard kept over men taken in at the New York City Headquarters, although the bounty was the same, was something which they preferred not to experience. The ferryboats were crowded in the morning, when men usually travel from Hoboken to New York, not the other way. One broker took over a squad of about 50.

The cheerfulness of the jumper, after coming in for enlistment, when he found what the arrangements were for taking in men, grew gradually small and less, until it finally left him altogether, and gave way, and the poor jumper became to dull despondency and dumb forgetfulness a prey. The stairs into the basement were wide and spacious, the basement is large and commodious; the happy jumper passed the officer, and was taken into the surgeon's apartment; from there he was taken out into the mustering office, and his progress from there was rather sudden, until he went up two pair of stairs, into the large ball or barroom in the upper part of the building. The rooms were so arranged that, after passing into the surgeon, the recruit became invisible to those in waiting. So it was that several hundreds of recruits were taken in, and put upstairs into the large room. No doubt they began to feel uncomfortable and surprised, when they saw their friends coming in so rapidly, and found themselves guarded by 80 soldiers, with loaded muskets.

Between two and three o'clock, the bounty-jumpers got an inkling of what was going on inside Odd Fellows' Hall. Some jumper may have communicated with his friends through a window, or the fact of so many being enlisted and none getting away, or receiving any money, may have aroused suspicion. At all events there started a general skedaddle, until a jumper could not have been hired for any consideration to enter Washington street. They did not even dare to go back to New York by the lower ferry, but went to the 42d street ferry, and some, it was stated, even to Weehawken, for fear of arrest.

Meanwhile their friends were lodged securely in Odd Fellows' Hall. They were a very motley crowd to look upon. They nearly filled the hall. The benches were placed as closely as possible on one side, and they sat closely together, resting themselves as best they might; some with their coats and hats off, some conversing, and altogether resembling the crowd in the pit of one of the Bowery theatres, grown a little older.

At about eight o'clock, Col. Baker went over to take his final measures. Proceeding to a small room, he seated himself at a table, with a person to note down their names; on each side of the Colonel was a barrel—one empty to receive—the other filled with shackles. The bounty-jumpers were brought in two by two, and the contents of their pockets deposited in the empty one, while in exchange they were linked together by a pair of shackles, and transferred to safe custody.

The manner in which the bounty-brokers were arrested was very ingenious. When they asked for money they were told to go to the ferry and wait till the officer came; as he said this, he laid his hand carelessly on the broker's shoulder, on which he left a small chalk-mark. In blissful ignorance of this distinguishing symbol, the unsuspecting broker walked down to the Hoboken ferry, where he was accosted by a detective, who invited him into the Hoboken Hotel, where he was quietly bagged. Our Artist has depicted the most prominent scenes with his usual graphic power, and we present them as a novel feature in the history of the present rebellion.

GEN. SCHOFIELD'S ARMY ON THE MARCH FOR GOLDSBOROUGH, MARCH 6.—REBEL WORKS IN THE REAR OF WILMINGTON.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

WILMINGTON, N. C.

OUR Artist's sketches of Wilmington, and the incidents connected with its capture by the Union army under Gen. Terry, are very interesting and important, since its occupation by us hermetically seals the rebels from their sympathising European confederates.

Wilmington is the capital of New Hanover county, N. C., situated on the east bank of Cape Fear river, 34 miles from the sea, 125 miles from Raleigh and 180 from Charleston. It contains 3 banks, 6 newspapers, 7 steam saw-mills, 2 planing-mills, 3 rice-mills, 10 turpentine distilleries, and 9 machine shops. It had a daily steam communication with Charleston, and also with Fayetteville, which is about 60 miles up Cape Fear river, and which town was occupied by Gen. Sherman on the 10th of March. Its foreign commerce was very considerable till 1861, and since then it has done an immense business with blockade-runners. Its population in 1830 was 5,097; in 1840, 4,744; in 1850, 7,264; and in 1860, 9,553.

In addition to the birdseye view we publish of Wilmington thus rescued from rebeldom, we give an exact sketch of the rebel defences in the rear of the city, which had been constructed in the vain hope of stopping the victorious march of our army. They were built with the usual engineering skill of the enemy.

We likewise engrave a very graphic view of our reinforcements crossing the river to Wilmington. These were landed at Smithville—already illustrated in a former number—a small town at the Atlantic entrance of the river, and about 20 miles from Wilmington. A glance at our cut renders further description needless.

In our account of the capture of Fort Anderson we mentioned that the precipitate retreat of the garrison was owing principally to the alarm created in the mind of the rebel commander at the unexpected sight of one of our dreaded monitors steaming past it, and in water so shallow that they considered themselves perfectly safe. We give a sketch of this bogus monitor, which was made of wood, and planned, we believe, by the gallant Cushing, whose achievements we have already chronicled.

The sketch representing the issuing of rations to the inhabitants of Wilmington is another evidence of the desperate straits to which the Southern States are reduced. Our Artist says: "It was a painful sight to see how the once haughty citizens of the great blockading emporium came for their family supplies. As usual, in similar cases, they were most courteously treated by the Federal authorities."

Recruiting Office for Contrabands.

There is something so strange and startling in raising a colored regiment in the very nest of slavery that it is impossible to regard it without the utmost interest. Our Artist says: "Nearly all the negroes who arrive in town go direct to the recruiting office, and are 'made into soldiers,' as they facetiously term it—an hour afterwards they are to be seen parading through the most frequented streets, giving themselves the most remarkable airs. It is Pompey all over."

Our Artist adds: "I had a hearty laugh to-day over a puppet-show which some enterprising Yankee had constructed. I sketched a few of the people gathered around, as a sort of character scene."

THE late Cardinal Wiseman was 63 years old and was the seventh Englishman who has achieved that rank in the Romish church since the reformation. He had considerable fame as an author and lecturer.

THE imports of Nassau, the great emporium for rebel blockade runners, were $1,972,220 in 1861, and $21,476,580 in 1864. Real estate advanced 400 per cent. during the same time.

THE HEBREW PURIM BALL AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC, MARCH 14.

COUSIN MARY.

I AM sitting, cousin Mary,
Now beneath the rising moon,
While the air is rich with fragrance
And the night is warm as June.

And I think as the silver crescent
Sails through the vault of blue,
That far off, in the land of flowers,
You sit and watch it too.

I am thinking, cousin Mary,
How we used to watch it shine,
As we sat among the roses,
With your dear hand clasped in mine;
While a soft and tender radiance
Shone within your eyes of blue,
As if the Angels whispered, dear,
Holy, blessed thoughts to you.

There was something, cousin Mary,
In the glance of your blue eyes
That would make my pulse bound quicker
And the soft tears gently rise;
Then my heart would tremble strangely
With a thrill half sad, half sweet,
As I sat 'mid the budding roses
In the moonlight, at your feet.

'Twas the pure gush, cousin Mary,
Of a brother's holy love,
That would thrill my breath so sweetly,
And my heart's deep pulses move.

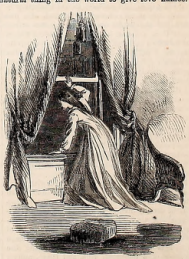
It was not an idle passion,
Lighter than a poet's spell,
But pure and deep as limpid waters
Of the fairies' mystic well.

May God bless you, cousin Mary,
With a long and happy life;
May your days ne'er know a shadow
Of dark care or sullen strife—
May the Angels ever whisper
Gentle thoughts all pure and sweet,
As they whispered 'mid the roses,
When I heard them, at your feet.

For the last two centuries no ruler of France has been succeeded by his own son.

AUNT GRACIE'S SHIP.

"Now, aunt Gracie, for that love story," cried brother Will, throwing himself on a stool at her feet, and glancing with supreme satisfaction at the glowing coal fire.



Brother Will always reminds me of a great, good-natured Newfoundland dog, and never more so than to-night, as he stretched himself in the warmth of the fire, shook back his long hair and looked up lovingly into aunt Gracie's face. Will is still in college, so his long hair is excusable.

"Love story," said aunt Gracie, softly, "did I promise to tell you a love story?"

"You promised to tell us how you came to be married," cried I, "and of course that's just the same thing."

"Ah, that's the way you make it out, is it?" and she looked at me with a smile that seemed to say that there might be worse logic than that in the world.

Aunt Gracie, you must know, is not our own auntie at all, but just a dear friend of mamma's, and of those persons to whom it seems the most natural thing in the world to give love names.

WAR'S ALARMS IN CINCINNATI.

When we were children her visits were looked forward to almost as much as Christmas, and her coming always made a holiday in the house.

Two years ago mama went east, for the purpose of being near brother Will, while he was in college; and I do believe one of the greatest griefs we all had in going was the thought of being so far from aunt Grace. But she promised to write to us often, and did, every week to mama, and to Will and to me whenever we took the trouble to write to her, but never otherwise. She had her own ideas about things, and used to quote an old proverb that to preserve friendship the balance of good offices must be maintained. Will and I were always going to write, but, scatter-brains that we were, the occasions when we actually did it were rare. But aunt Grace writes the nicest letters in the world, and when we got real homesick to hear from her we used to make a desperate effort and send a few pages of our trash, knowing what delightful sheets we should get in reply.

When we were little things, wanting all sorts of impossible possessions, she used to tell us that we must wait for her ship to come home, and there were few things that we wanted for that we did not believe would one day arrive in that wonderful ship. As we grew older, she used to tell us that it had not yet been able to run the blockade of adverse fortune, but that it was sure to come some day. We had full faith in it and in all the wealth with which we freighted it. Imagine our delight when mama said to us one day:

"Well, my dears, your aunt Gracie's ship has come home, and she wants us to go and spend the holidays with her."

"Oh, delightful!" we both exclaimed. "Can we go? But what do you mean about the ship? Of course we know now that aunt Gracie never meant a real ship, but some wonderful good fortune or other. What can it be?"

Mama looked very knowing, but only held aunt Gracie's letter towards us, saying:

"There is her own word for it."

We read:

"Tell Willie and Ruth that my ship has come at last, and I want them to spend the holidays with me, so that we can examine its treasures together."

"How odd! what do you suppose she means, mama?"

"How can I tell, my dears?"

But Will and I exchanged glances; we knew by her eyes—mama has lovely eyes—that she knew all about it. After all, we didn't care to know just after we were certain of going. It was delightful, we said, to have something to conjecture about, especially when we were sure to find it all out at last.

The most provoking thing was the amused look with which mama listened to our conjectures. Will she said, looked amused, for we were none near the truth; but hit upon the wildest and most improbable things. Such as her aunt Gracie had left a fortune left her by some rich relative that she never heard of; or that she had written a book and made one; or that some rich person had taken a fancy to her—nothing more likely—and died, leaving her mistress of house and lands.

Journeys, the conjectures, must have an end, and in due time we arrived at the end of ours—the depot in Cincinnati. Imagine our delight when at the platform a middle-aged gentleman stepped up to mama, and said interrogatively:

"Mrs. Douglas?"

To which she bowed, and answered:

"Mr. Walbridge, I presume."

And the next instant they were shaking hands, and smiling on each other's faces, as if they had been dear friends meeting after long absence, instead of perfect strangers as I supposed at first. Will and I stood on each other. We were so perplexed, for you know mama's dignity, and how unapproachable she is to strangers. Our mystification increased when we heard Mr. Walbridge say:

"Grace said you wouldn't expect to meet her here, but at the door of her own house."

"I understand," said mama, but here she seemed to remember us, and added, "I and the two children, Mr. Walbridge; my daughter Ruth."

Very satisfactory to him no doubt; he seemed to have no difficulty in defining and localizing "my son and daughter," but who the mischief was he, this elegant Mr. Walbridge, and brother Will and I could not find out, for who talked of aunt Gracie's house, and seemed to have taken possession of us all? Seemed? he had. He had taken the checks for our baggage, given orders about it in a dozen low, rapidly uttered words, put us into a carriage, and that was where the carriage I noticed—tucked us in with a number of buffalo robes and Afghans, and now sat there opposite mama, smiling and talking as if he had known her twenty years.

I didn't mind much which way we went, I was to have a sleigh ride, and Mr. Walbridge.

Just the sort of man, thought I, that any young girl would like to call uncle, or have for a guardian. A man like unclebee; very kindful of kindness, and yet with a look in them that would make one just the least bit afraid. Lips fashioned for saying Yes, but certainly capable of a most uncompromising No should duty require it.

His hair and beard were just touched with silver—I doubt if I shall ever be able to fall in love with a man till he is gray—and his manner the perfection of a gentleman, without a touch of selfishness or formality. I was looking away but listening, and thinking how irresistible that sort of voice would be in a lover, when the carriage turned from the road. It was entering the grounds of a suburban villa, and there, among the trees, was the castle. No great monstrous creation of brick and mortar, towering up opaque and uncompromising as if bent upon looking down out of its impenetrance; but one with a look of a home, with verandas, and bay windows, and gables, with picturesque chimneys and overhanging eaves, and a great willow drooping at one side. But the sort of house aunt Gracie had pictured to us as the one she would have when her ship came in, and there in the doorway was aunt Gracie herself, looking so handsome and ten years younger than I had ever seen her.

She and mama were in each other's arms in a moment, and what seemed odd, they both cried, though they were laughing all the time too; and then she kissed brother Will and me, and Mr. Walbridge stood there, looking, it seemed to me, as if he was both pleased and proud that we were now brought up, and she told us we must dress, for there would be company to dinner. She would stay to help mama, and see how we all looked, and so I did not have an opportunity to find out anything about Mr. Walbridge, or the wonderful ship.

Sure enough, when we went to the parlor there was quite a room full of people, and we all had to be introduced, but somehow it was not a bit awkward, and in five minutes we were quite at ease. I was not long in the room before I knew that, however it had come about, aunt Gracie was married. Evidently Mr. Walbridge was master of the house and she its mistress.

Evidently they had never thought of the possibility of aunt Gracie marrying; perhaps because she seemed so complete and happy in herself. Now I was going to know all Mr. Walbridge's friends, and I could see was Will. The minute we got to our rooms, which was not till ever so late, we both pitched at mama with questions.

"It's of no use," said she, laughing; "I shan't tell you a word. Your aunt Gracie forbids it; but she said I might tell you that Mr. Walbridge is a widower alone she will tell you the whole story. Till then you are to possess your souls impatience—if you can—quite certain that dinner will not be delayed."

"Now, mama, if that isn't the last," we ejaculated, in the same breath, but there was no help, the decree had gone forth.

In the days that succeeded we exhausted that affluence of diction for which young people are said to be remarkable, in praising the house, the grounds, the furniture, the dinners, aunt Gracie's splendid dresses and Mr. Walbridge's hospitality, dignity and manly beauty.

I thought the people more worth our, so that we could have full opportunity of studying them. There were other guests staying in the house, and people driving out from town to dinner, and parties made up to go to the opera, theatre, and tableaux, and to private theatricals; in short, no end of gay doings, and then so many delightful people. It seemed to me that I had never met with so many in my whole life before, though whether it was that the people were really so charming in and of themselves, or that my aunt was most agreeable in them was called out, is a question that I have never quite settled.

Brother Will and I had a larger bear were brought into aunt Gracie's parlor, she and Mr. Walbridge would develope something genial and amiable in him," and I don't know but they would.

Finally, the last batch of guests disappeared on New Year's Day, and I was pretty much all this year I had always thought such a bore—was over, we had a quiet dinner, and Mr. Walbridge, to whom I believe aunt Gracie owed much, had the betaken himself to the library, with the excuse of business letters to write. There was just we four in the parlor. Mama was busy with a piece of delicious crimson armchairs which seemed to have been made expressly for her, with brother Will at her feet, and I on a low ottoman by the fire, when with me seated on a hassock beside her, for I liked to get far enough away from aunt Gracie to see her to advantage.

"Now for the love story," repeated Will, "and I hope it's a good long one, for I've got fixed so comfortably I don't want to move for the next two hours. It's jolly to sit here so warm and easy, and hear the wind sweeping across the lawn, and tugging at the great willow just outside the window."

"Yes, aunt Gracie," I interposed, "you must tell us every word of it, for I mean to be so sniping or cutting it short. We want you to tell it just as if you sat here alone, and were thinking it all over yourself."

A shadow fell upon aunt Gracie's face, and she looked towards the library door with a little sigh, and then turned her head, pressing her hand, which rested in here. We both knew she was thinking of the years she had spent alone, and how sad it would be to her to have them recalled, but only though, in an instant. Taking a fan from the table and holding it between her face and the fire, she seated herself and began:

You know, Margaret, I spent the summer of 1862 in Cincinnati. Dear Jennie Dorn wanted to go with her husband and babies to the seaside, and there was no reason why I should not, only to be shut up, and containing too many valuable things to be trusted to the mercy of housebreakers and the dreadful insanity of servants. So, to make me about the dilemma she was in, and I packed a trunk, went in town and took possession of the grocery establishment, which at once relieved Jennie of anxiety and gave me an interest, for, as you know, I dost upon housekeeping, and, next to home, I like a store, and I was pretty sure to enjoy making believein that of some friend. Jennie understands me perfectly, and gave me leave to preserve, pickle and preach to my heart's content. "You might "put up" what I chose, and try as many experiments as I liked. There was an open account at the grocery, and I would find a check for me down to the store and get it, and if I was lonesome I was to invite some one I liked to come and stay with me. Could say thing have been more delightful?

The family got off the first of June. The girl I had helped engage that I should be bothered with but one; put the house in order, shut out the dust and daylight from the unoccupied rooms, and then went to my daily doings like a good, sound table for two. A married brother of Mr. Dorn's, whose wife had also gone to the seaside, had left a horse and buggy at his disposal. Instead of dinner I had lunch brought me on a tray, and I generally managed to have some friend opposite me at tea. Miss Atwell, who lives, you know, only two squares from the Dorns, was a great resource, we saw each other daily. And the breakfast hour was out of town, which made it delightful for the sensible people who were left. No necessity for sitting in shirty dignity in curl papers and a morning wrapper, but able things to go out and make them. It seemed to have forgotten how to rain, and the weather was invariably hot. Miss Atwell used to send her girl early in the morning with a note, "Will you come and picnic in my parlor to-day? It is cooler than yours." And I would write "Yes," put two bottles of porter in a basket and go. At other times my girl, who rejoiced in the remarkable name of Amy, would appear with a note from Miss Atwell: "Will you come to tea? Wallies," and she would answer "Yes," and come. Such a rare woman is Miss Atwell! I wish, Margaret, you knew her. She is one of the very few women in this world who reach middle life unmarried without being embittered or dwarfed by it. Large-brained and large-hearted, self-sacrificed and unexceptionally proper, but without a touch of prudery, and like Mrs. Browning's Lady Geraldine, with "sympathies so rapid, open, free as bird on branch," a person who always says the right thing at the right time, who never what ought to be done and how to do it, who is always equal to any emergency, and neither too great nor too little for any occasion.

I used to delight in making our little teas—for Miss Atwell is always "afternoon tea" in dainty as possible; whites of eggs, thin bread and butter, and cream of cut-glass did honor to these occasions, to say nothing of an exquisite fete-à-fete teaset, a present to Jennie from Mr. Dorn's bachelor brother Ned. There it had stood on the sideboard ever since the Christmas day it was sent home, tantalizing me beyond measure with that which I dared not consecrated by use. I had made the right to drink tea out of those cups one of the conditions of my taking charge of the house.

"What were they like, aunt Gracie?" I asked. "Do tell us all about them."

There were two cups and saucers, a teapot, sugar-bowl and cream pitcher, all of the finest Sèvres china, and all of the same material. They were thin as an eggshell, and exquisitely ornamented with black and gold. Tea drunk out of an ordinary cup was tea, and black; but out of such a cup as that it is nectar, and suggests Hebe and Ganymede. Miss Atwell and I grew eloquent on the subject, and discussed new measures and the state of the country, the comparative merits of rival generals, and the probable length of the war, and I proposed a great many things that I thought I had agreed with the ancients, that the "mills of God grind slowly," also sorely, and that when he puts the nations to school, and gives them a long lesson must be humble and stand aside. Books, too, received their share of attention. "Les Miserables" was just out, and we had a long and delightful committee of two, sat in judgment. Plot, incidents, characters, moral influence were duly considered, and the verdict was unanimously pronounced a great one—though if Victor Hugo had consulted us, he could, without doubt, have made some valuable suggestions.

The days went too fast, for I dare hardly tell you how much I enjoyed them. "I'm going to Brine Soon to market," said George Dorn one morning, setting down his coffee-cup and hissing to the roots of his hair. George has a habit of hissing, and, by the way, one of those remarkably silent persons whom you never think of trying to entertain, and whose speech, when he does open his mouth, is always as welcome as that of Balaam's ass. He was so absorbed in the wretched state of the country and in the miserable condition of mankind generally that he thought quite an impertinence to be happy in his presence. Looking at his pale, wee-begone face—he was a victim to dyspepsia, poor man!—I felt very mischievously inclined for my own good health and spirits, and remorsefully did my best to tone down the exuberance of both that day, and succeeded, I am quite positive. We used to meet at the breakfast-table morning after morning, and run our opposition lines of thought against each other, and never a track lay speedy for the present outbreak, therefore, was little less than miraculous.

"I'm sorry!" I inquired.

"Don't know Sam, eh? Ought to; got the tin —splendid fellow—just suit you."

"But what is he? Sam isn't the only name he has, i suppose?"

"Sam! No; he's got another name. Where's my pocket. This man——" Ah, I've got it in my pocket. This man——"

But the sentence died away in a profound yawn, in the midst of which he put on his hat and went to find out new revelations of human misery. Weeks that I was, I couldn't help hoping as I heard after Mr. Dorn's exit, it seem so little worth while to convert oneself into a walking epitome of sorrows past, present and to come. It was a dreadful time for many of my friends and went round to the market. I was capitating peaches. How many should I put up? What preparation should be made for the winter preserves? How many jars branded and how many pickles? Of the many varieties which was best? Gingerines for pickles after mature deliberation I fixed on the sock-boots, but who that has tried to manage a brandypeach at a party, with high hats and low ceilings? I am not sure that I should not have cut the peaches and citings? I shall get free stones was my final decision; but should they be three luscious golden peaches, or the dozen of mixed fruit? Will please write hastily. Truly the subject was a vast one.

Suddenly I walked into a pair of arms, and looked out of my reverie to find Miss Atwell having my way and laughing at my abstraction.

"You can't have heard the news," she cried, "or you would never be dreaming along in this fashion."

"News! No. What is it?" I asked, slowly becoming conscious that there were other interests in the world besides peaches.

"Why, the most wonderful news. The rebels, are now marching strong, with Kirby Smith at their head, are in Kentucky, marching straight on Cincinnati, and are likely to make their appearance here at any hour. What do you think of that?"

"I think I don't believe it."

"Oh, it's true. It's on the bulletin boards, with a proclamation of martial law, and all the places of business are ordered to be closed, and all able-bodied men to report themselves immediately for military duty. I was just going uptown to see how things look under the new order. Come, go with me."

Fairly awake, I wondered I had not noticed the signs of unusual excitement everywhere apparent. Knots of men held brief but earnest consultation on the corners; women leaned out of windows and looked anxiously up and down the street. Most of the places of business were already closed, but here and there a door stood ajar, showing those within making such hurried arrangements for security as the time allowed. Occasionally a man came out as we passed, locked the door, and put the key in his pocket, with an air that seemed to question when he should have occasion to use it again. Every face was full of anxiety, and the great heart of the city seemed to throb painfully in the close atmosphere of the impending storm.

We wandered about for a long time, meeting every now and then an acquaintance metamorphosed by soldier clothes, who gave us a hurried greeting, and not unfrequently some alarming additional item of news. The prolonged drought had so lessened the river that it was supposed to be fordable at several points within a comparatively short distance of the city. The military organizations formed on the breaking out of the war as a Home Guard, and for a time kept up with spirit, had gradually fallen off, and for a long time had been but nominally mounted. There was no effective military force in the city, nothing to prevent the enemy taking possession of the Kentucky side opposite and shelling us, or marching in, in broad day, and plundering to their heart's content. Everything was to be done, and no twenty-four hours perhaps to do it in. All were forbidden to leave the city; merchants, whose homes were in the country, sighed over sorrel and hampers, which for the present they could not get, and engaged supper and a night's lodging in town.

One could not settle to much that day; but as I make it a rule never to believe in misfortunes till they actually come, I see my lunch with a very good appetite, and made no earlier dinner than usual. Then I sat down by the window with my knitting, and waited to see what would happen next. The streets gradually evinced that people was taking place. Baggage and express-wagons full of trunks rattled by, and carriages crowded with women and children, carpetbags and bonnets. The whole population of well-dressed men had disappeared. A few old men, cripples and invalids entered about, and boys, and wide excitement, raced hither and thither, anxious, if possible, to be in all parts of the city at once. I was about to put on my solitary tea, when George Dorn walked in;

"Scarce," was his laconic salutation.

"No, young people have none to-day."

"Does anything ever disturb you?"

"Not often; where's the use?"

"Suppose they should take cross before morning?"

"I don't believe they'll come at all."

"But suppose they do?"

"Why, then I shall close the blinds, hide the silver, and wait to see what next."

He began a laugh, but ended as usual in a hiss.

"I wish William was home. There's the store full of goods, and if anything happens——"

"Nothing will happen, and having finished tea with out once noticing the exquisite cup in which it was served, he disappeared. I sat up late. At eleven there was silence over the city, the heavy tramp of armed men, and the quick, sharp word of command. Two regiments passed the house. I went out on the gate and watched them as they marched up the street, their long line of bayonets undulating and glimmering in the moonlight.

I went to bed to sleep when I arrived. It did not know how long I had been asleep, when I was awakened by the ringing of a bell. I sleep through a good deal of ringing of bells—all the year round. But this was peculiar. With slow, monotonous swell, peal after peal rolled over the city and died away among the hills. What was the meaning? I wondered. I got up and went and leaned out at the window Men and boys were hurrying by. A cash was thrown from a neighboring house. "What is it?" called a voice to some one passing.

"The rebels have forded the river and are within five miles of the city."

"Is that all?" What was to be done? Should I call the girl? She would be frightened out of her wits, and worry me with her questions. Should I dress? They might not come. I had a great mind to go back to bed. Just then a clock struck three from a steeple in the neighborhood. Four hours more, it would be daylight. I concluded to dress and be ready to receive the distinguished guests who were expected. I dressed in the parlor, for I was a fickle dame; but it had its effect in more thoroughly arousing the city. Every man capable of bearing a musket was pressed into the service, and every house was besieged by officers in quest of the raw material.

"How many able-bodied men have you here?" asked a tall, handsome, soldierly looking officer of Amy, who had answered the imperative summons of the doorbell.

"Only two, sir," replied the frightened girl, "Mr. Barstowe and me."

Miss Atwell and I went out daily to reconnoitre, and took immense interest in all that was going on.

A pontoon bridge had been built across the Ohio river, and over it poured an endless procession of soldiers, hastily armed countrymen, and wagons containing everything needful for the subsistence of an army. All the water carts were forced into service, so there was no more street sprinkling, and the dust on such high considerable soldiers rose pouring in from every direction, and the entire male population of the State seemed being employed in the pontoon bridge, as through it, and into Kentucky.

Arrangements were made at the Fifth Street Market House for feeding the hungry multitudes that passed through on their way over the river, and wagons went each day from house to house collecting provisions for this public table.

Miss Atwell and I were sitting in the parlor one evening when we were startled by the violent ringing of the door-bell. The door opened and Dr. Grant. His leather shoes were soaked with water, his pantaloons splashed to the knees; the sleeves of his linen coat spotted with grease, and his tempest of black hair tossed about his face even more wildly than usual. He looked wretchedly tired, and dropped into the first chair he came to.

"Well, doctor," said I, "we needn't ask if you have been on duty, but I should like to know where."

"Let me have a glass of wine to put a little life in me," said he, "and I'll tell you."

Awny brought the wine with a biscuit and some slices of tongue, which the doctor disposed of with evident satisfaction. Finding that he was to be our guest for the night—his house was out of town—I sent him upstairs to make some changes in his toilet. Clean stockings, slippers and a dressing-gown of the absent Dorn, with a judicious application of cold water and hairbrush, quite metamorphosed him, and having bestowed himself in an easy chair, he proceeded to tell us his day's experience at the Market House.

"I've done more scolding to-day," said he, "than I ever did in my whole life before. It's enough to turn all the milk of human kindness in one's body to Dutch cheese, to see the shameful waste that is going on up there. Victuals enough sent to feed an army, everything of the best, never was a more generous people than these Cincinnatians, and one half of it just wasted through want of care. I declare it's too bad."

"But how does it come about?" we asked.

"Why there are no responsible people there to take charge of things. All the men are off on military duty; it's a place where ladies won't think of going, and so a lot of crazy pated boys and thieving beggars have it pretty much their own way. I stopped, out of curiosity, on my way to the office this morning, and seeing how things were going, staid and went to work. But there's been enough smuggled away from there to-day, and scattered about and trampled under feet, to feed a regiment. I managed to have guards placed at the doors before I came away, which will put a stop to some of it, I hope."

"But what's to hinder ladies from going and looking after the provisions they have sent, I should like to know?"

"Nothing in the world, only they won't do it."

"Miss Atwell, let's you and I go."

"Agreed! The doctor shall initiate us into our duties immediately after breakfast to-morrow morning."

"Good!" said the doctor, "but don't forget the plight I was in when I came. In spite of the efforts made to keep the place clean, it's frightfully dirty, and you will see more rough human nature then you ever dreamed of before."

"No matter; we shall be in no danger of meeting anybody we know; and the opportunity of seeing a new phase of life is too good to be lost."

The doctor smiled grimly as we met him in the parlor next morning, equipped in leather walking shoes and calico wrappers, for our day's work.

"I'm not fit to be seen in the street with you," said he, glancing at his greasy coat, "but I'll meet you at the door of the market-house, and mind, I shan't be surprised if your courage gives out when you get that far."

We had no such idea, however. Taking a small basket, and putting into it some towels for any emergency that might arise, some peaches for our lunch, and a couple of aprons, we set out, telling Awny that she might expect us in time for tea, but not much before. I believe we both felt that we were going to do something uncommonly heroic, especially when we reached the market-house, and the two soldiers stationed at the door raised their crossed bayonets and allowed us to pass. The doctor was just inside, talking with a gentleman in a gray suit and broad-brimmed straw hat. It was a relief to find, when he turned towards us, that he was a stranger, for in spite of our enthusiasm about being of use, I doubt if either Miss Atwell or I would have cared to meet just then any one of our "dear five hundred friends."

"Now," said the doctor, "the way for you to work most effectively will be to take charge of the baskets as they come in and classify their contents, so that they can be got at when wanted. I shall leave you, Mrs. Barstowe, at this end of the the market-house, take Miss Atwell to the other, and establish myself in the centre, where I can oversee you both;" and before I had time fairly to get possession of my wits, he had marched off, leaving me standing in the midst of the chaos out of which I had so confidently undertaken to evoke order.

Down the whole length of the centre of the building were rude tables, formed by laying planks on the butcher's blocks, and covered with an impromptu tablecloth of newspapers. A regiment had just breakfasted, and filed out on their way over the river, and a swarm of active, impudent, jolly representatives of Young America, of ages ranging from ten to fifteen, were clearing away the debris, preparatory to setting the tables for the next hungry comers. Fragments of all sorts were hastily pitched under the stalls, where heaps of the same material had already accumulated; newspapers splashed with coffee were sent after them, and replaced by fresh ones; brooms were plied spite of the inch of soft mud with which the floor was covered, and that and the fallen fragments cleared away together.

The doctor, I found, had not overdrawn the picture of the abundance, the waste, the confusion, and above all, the filth of this hastily improvised eatinghouse of the public. I looked down at my tidy walking shoes, they were already splashed to the ankles. I thought of my white skirts and sighed. I confess it, for one moment my resolution faltered; there is something crushing to enthusiasm in the aspect of mud and broken victuals. Besides, what could a single individual do where twenty were needed? Something certainly; and I took off my shawl, hung it and my basket on a hook, and went to work.

Bread, biscuit, pies, cakes, joints of meat, boiled hams, baked apples potatoes, pickles, cheese, crackers, in short everything in the shape of solid eatables was piled promiscuously in the stalls. To clear a little space and begin to classify was my aim, leaving Young America to go on with laying the tables.

"Can I assist you?" said a pleasantly modulated voice beside me, and turning I encountered the man in gray.

"If you will be good enough to help me get these loaves of bread together, and to make a place for them, so that I can arrange the rest of the provisions, I shall feel obliged to you."

He comprehended, and set to work. Bread, beef, hams, vegetables and pastry were rapidly collected in groups, and as basket after basket arrived, their contents were deposited, each kind in its own place. I found I had a most valuable aid, and by the way, Margaret, did it ever occur to you how grandly effective is a man's strength? I think I never realised it more than I did that day, as I watched my unknown ally so easily accomplishing a task that to me had seemed Herculean. I wondered if Miss Atwell had been as fortunate in an assistant, but forgot to ask the doctor when he came to see how I was getting on. He was delighted at the change that had been effected, and looked approvingly at my aid, who was industriously cutting meat and bread for a detatchment of squirrel-shooters who were pouring in.

"Do you know him?" I asked.

"Never saw him till this morning. Drove in from somewhere about here with a lot of baskets; sent his man to the livery stable with his horse and buggy." With which brief account the doctor hurried away to see that his tables were in order, while I assisted Young America in replenishing mine. It was surprising to see how comfortable a meal hungry men could make without plates, knives or napkins. Slices of meat, each on a piece of bread, were placed along the sides of the tables, while down the centre were distributed pies, cakes, potatoes, pickles and apples. Buckets of hot coffee were brought from the neighboring houses, and served in tin cups without sugar or milk.

These country people interested me. It seemed incredible that men just from their homes and harvest-fields could so readily exchange the implements of husbandry for the rifle and powder-flask, and march away to almost certain deadly conflict as gaily as if it were only but for a day's shooting. The ranks were made up of all ages, from beardless boys to grayhaired grandsires; but all, apparently, animated by the same spirit of cheerfulness, determination, courage. They ate heartily; many of them taking the precaution to fill their pockets with rations, while the jest and laugh passed merrily from one group to another.

"Say, ma'am," called out a good-looking six-footer, "won't you jest quarter up that pie with the knife you've got in your hand? It looks mighty good. I'd take the whole on't if I warn't afraid 'twould look kind o' mean. Thank'e, ma'am; now if you'll jest cut me off a hunk of that gingerbread to put in my pocket, I'll dance at your wedding."

"Get an invitation first, won't you?" called out a comrade.

"That's a fact; I mayn't get an invite, but I'll wish you a husband any how."

Among the thousands of men who passed through the market-house that day, I heard no rougher jest than that.

About the middle of the afternoon the alarm-bell began to ring; and a man rushed in out of breath, climbed on one of the tables, and announced that the rebels had reached the opposite side of the river, and that an engagement was going on between them and our forces. A regiment had just come in, but they did not stay to eat; seizing what they could lay hands on, they started off at the double quick, eating as they went. Even the guards deserted the doors, and had their places supplied by boys with broomsticks. I began to grow wretchedly tired. I had seen nothing of Miss Atwell, and the peaches we brought for our lunch I had given to a sick soldier. The idea of eating, in the midst of a world of provisions, was as preposterous as laying in ice at the North pole. I felt as if I had taken food enough by absorption to last me the rest of my natural life.

The man in grey had been as busy as myself all day. Too busy for talking we had just remarked; but now as I leaned against a stall, wondering if I could stand it much longer, and how I should get home, for shoes and skirts were in a condition that would not bear the daylight of the streets; and, above all, how this huge feeding machine could possibly go on without us, he stopped to speak to me.

"I am afraid you are doing too much; you look tired."

"I believe I am a little tired," and as I spoke a deadly faintness seized me, and the face before me disappeared in a darkness that dropped down upon me like an extinguisher. You think I am going to tell you that I fainted, and that he caught me in his arms. No such thing; I rallied in an instant without his suspecting that I had been near perpetrating such a folly.

"Can I get you anything?" I heard him say, apparently a great way off, as his face emerged from the darkness. "You have eaten nothing, and must be exhausted."

"Nothing, thank you; but you may, if you please, call the gentleman with whom you were talking when we came this morning."

He disappeared, and came back in a moment with the doctor.

"Doctor," I said, trying hard to look as if nothing was the matter, "I believe I will go home, if Miss Atwell is ready; and as we are in such a plight from this mud, will you get us a carriage?"

Too shrewd to be imposed upon, the doctor took in the state of the case at a glance, and began to laugh.

"Pretty well tired out, eh! Won't want to come again to-morrow, I reckon."

"I think it's real mean of you to laugh at me——"

"Especially when you have worked to such good purpose," said the man in gray, gallantly coming to my aid.

"Well, I won't laugh," said the doctor, laughing, meantime, heartier than ever. "I'll go and tell Miss Atwell, and then see if I can get you a carriage."

She came presently, and I saw at a glance that she was glad enough of the summons, for she was almost as thoroughly devitalised as myself—and what a plight we were both in. We could not help laughing at the figure we cut; but meantime my head seemed splitting, and I cared for nothing but to get home and into bed.

The carriage came; my friend in grey helped us in, and hoped that a night's rest would fully restore us. The doctor went with us, for he was going out home and it was on his way to the train. It was time he went, for his pantaloons were twice as muddy, his coat three times as greasy, and his hair six times as tempestuous as it was last night. He needed renovating. We left Miss Atwell at her own door. She refused my invitation to tea with a shudder that I appreciated, and the pious ejaculation, "From all things eatable for the present deliver us." I grew worse so rapidly, that when I reached home the doctor had to help me into the house, and give Awny instructions about taking care of me.

What an agonizing headache I had, and how all that night, and the next day, I lay, caring not a pin for rebels, whether far or near; caring only for silence, and darkness, and immunity from odors, especially the odor of victuals. My enthusiasm was toned down perfectly, and when, two days after, Miss Atwell came and told me that affairs at the market-house were administered by a score of colored waiters, I did not experience a single jealous pang.

As you know, Kirby Smith did not march on Cincinnati, but in an opposite direction. There was no fighting; the great scare subsided, and permission was given for those heroes of a bloodless victory to return home and resume business. Miss Atwell and I had neither husband nor son over the river, but many of our friends had; so we rejoiced at the orders, and went with the rest to see them return. It was a grand sight. Both sides of the river were thronged with spectators; flags waved and drums beat, cannon roared; everybody was in exuberant spirits for the danger past, and the loved ones coming home. Regiment after regiment filed down the bank on the Kentucky side, crossed the pontoon bridge, and trod again the pavement of the Queen City, made a hundred fold dearer by the danger which had threatened her.

Here comes the Commander-in-Chief, handsome Lew Wallace, surrounded by his staff. Bareheaded, bowing in acknowledgment to the hurras of men and the thousand smiles and fluttering handkerchiefs of women that greeted him from the streets, the windows, the very housetops. There, beside him, rode T. Buchanan Read, who, not content with being the pet of the nine Muses, was now paying court to Mars; and here, scarcely recognisable for dust and tan, was my elegant, exquisite and most fastidious friend, Blake Barringer.

It has often been a question in my mind whether certain persons—Quakers, for instance, and here and there an individual among the world's people, were not inherently endowed with an ounce of cleanliness, enabling them to pass unsullied through the highways and byways of this dirty world; but the moment I saw Blake Barringer the question was settled; for even he, I found, was subject to dust.

A carriage passed me, making its way slowly through the crowd. It contained three ladies and a gentleman. Womanlike, I was scanning the dresses of the ladies, when it occurred to me that the face of their cavalier was not unknown to me. I looked at him; certainly I had seen that face before—but where? Of course he turned and looked at me; people always do when you are observing them. A peculiar smile lighted up his face, and as I mentally ejaculated "the man in gray," he raised his hand and gave me a military salute. I laughed in spite of myself, quite sure at the same time that I ought to be vexed. But the thing was so gracefully done, and with an air that could not be construed into intentional impertinence. The recognition had escaped Miss Atwell, and I did not think it worth while to tell her.

The Dorns came back from the seaside, but Jennie would have me stay and spend the autumn. There was no reason why I shouldn't, so we talked up our respective summers, and finished the pickling and preserving which Kirby Smith had interrupted. Twice when Jennie and I were out we met my ex-aid. He smiled each time in passing, and gave me the military salute, but I seemed far as ever from finding out who he was. To confess the truth, I was growing a little curious on the subject.

"Sam's in town," said George Dorn, one day, as he entered the parlor where I was sitting. Mrs. George was still absent, and he took his meals with us. "Asked him to come to dinner, but he wouldn't. Wish you and Sam knew each other."

I laughed at the good-natured wish to provide me with a husband.

"Who does George mean by Sam?" I asked Jennie, when we were alone.

"Sam? I don't know; he names people to suit himself. I never know who he means. How much of this delaine will it take to make Kitty a dress?"

"Sam," thought I, "may be very well worth knowing, but I would rather know something about the man in gray. There seemed little probability, however, of my making the acquaintance of either, for I went back to the country, and shortly after went East to spend the winter. It was April when Jennie wrote, begging me to return. She gave a score of good reasons, and as they tallied with my own inclinations, I went. It was a week after my arrival that I was walking up Fourth street one morning. I was staring into the treetops which were just bursting into magnificence of foliage, when a breath of perfume arrested my attention.

"Will you accept these flowers, they are very fragrant?"

There he stood, the man in gray, but before I could muster my surprised and routed wits, he was gone. So sudden had been the apparition and its disappearance, that but for the flowers I might have fancied it an optical illusion—but there they were, the darling, fresh, dewy, delicious, not tied like martyrs to a stake, and made up into one of those stiffest and stupidest distortions of things beautiful, a bouquet, but just clustered together, as if they had arranged themselves, like children at play. A whole handful of greenery, with hyacinths, violets, lily of the valley, two half-blown roses and a few buds. It was a floral tableau; an epitome of all past springs; a promise of all that were to come. Ought I to have been angry? Perhaps, but I love flowers.

That evening, as Jennie and I were sitting in the parlor, Blake Barringer was announced. He had come one with him—the man in gray.

"My friend Mr. Walbridge, Mrs. Dorn, Mrs. Barstowe, Mr. Walbridge."

One expressive glance passed between us, but there was no other token that we had met before. His flowers stood on the table, and I had a spray of the lily of the valley in my hair.

Aunt Gracie paused. "Well," said brother Will, giving an expressive toss to his own long hair, "what else? I hope you're not going to stop just as it's growing interesting."

"Nothing else, only there never was such a summer as followed that spring. The Dorns went to Mackinaw, and Miss Atwood and I went with them. Mr. Walbridge joined us there, and we used to ride and boat. I liked to spend the delicious evenings at a particular spot where the shore made a bend. I was not always alone—"

Aunt Gracie was hanging her lovely head, and her talk was growing a little incoherent.

"We would watch the light upon the water. In fact, I believe I—I was watching my ship come in."

"Oh, I know," said Will. "I know the tailor that made the wings that she did fly withal."

Will must have been reading the Merchant of Venice. Mama just went up to aunt Gracie—I always did think mama the most perfectly graceful lady I ever met—and touched her hair, and whispered:

"There is no ship like friendship."

PURIM BALL AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The Purim balls, by their able management, both financially and otherwise, have become one of the fashionable institutions of the metropolis, for not only are the number of the tickets limited, but the greatest care is exercised as to the persons who receive them. That of Tuesday, the 14th, was one of the brightest, most select, and altogether enjoyable assemblies ever held at the Academy. Through the polite attentions of Mr. Adolph L. Sanger, floor manager, and of Mr. Bradley, a decorator, we had the amplest opportunities of participating in all the festivities, and examining the costumes and beauty of the superb young Jewesses and other ladies.

The adornments, as arranged by Messrs. Moses and Sanger, the committee on decorations, could not but dazzle one at first by their splendor. The back of the stage was brilliantly illuminated by the words "Merry Purim," and the monogram of the society appearing in jets of gas over a double terrace filled with natural flowers, comprising the most costly exotics and other plants in baskets, pots and tubs, which with their fragrant smell filled the whole house. The rear of this flower-garden showed the word "Charity," formed of flowers and leaves.

The balustrade around the amphitheatre was decorated with garlands of banded flowers, the family circle gallery was covered with festoons of cloth, in all the colors of the rainbow, while under the dress circle were hung caricatures and other funny pictures painted on cloth.

Among these were a Procession of Fools, Bacchus and Momus, Don Quixote fighting the Windmill, King of Hearts with Lady and Astrologer, Lent riding on a Fish. The Monroe Doctrine and the Emperor Maximilian was a well gotten-up affair. It represented Maximilian, of Mexico, running away from his chair of state, carrying a few tropical fruits and a parrot, to confront Maximilian, the decorator, who hands him his business card, surrounded with the names of the principal city papers, including the Herald, Times, News, World, Staats Zeitung, etc.

From the dome of the house, Maximilian, the decorator of the whole, had hung a huge basket of flowers, surmounted by a military tent, while eighteen flags were arranged around the parquet columns, with their spear heads composed of tin knives and forks and spoons.

The order of dancing shone forth from under two arches, ten feet square, surrounded with paintings of tropical plants, and producing a pleasant effect.

Among the masks faithfully represented by our Artist will be noticed a magnificent Marie Stuart, in black velvet and diamonds; Mephistopheles arm-in-arm with Midnight, who was covered with stars; an exquisite costume of rich pink silk, edged with down; two lovely Vivandieres: a beautiful Schwarzwald Peasant Girl, with fair flowing hair; and an admirably dressed Harlequin. Never, for many years, have such rich, original and costly dominoes been displayed at a ball in New York.

Among the maskers were quite a number of funny characters, more easily understood by the adherents of the Jewish faith: The "Tefilin," or praying boxes worn by the Jews; a caricature on the Polish Jews; a bootblack, with brushes, intent upon blacking the ladies' boots or shoes; a masker with a high hat, "The Man in Search of a House," and labelled on the back, "To Let, inquire of the Provost-Marshal," created much sensation; a male woman, who sold the "Balsam of Esther," a cosmetic, in the shape of boxes of dough, at the rate of ten cents a-piece, did a thriving business for the benfit of the poor; there was also a locksmith, with skeleton keys, desirous of opening the hearts of all the ladies whose hearts were closed to the fascination of the sterner sex.

Of the distinguished guests were a number of Jewish divines, including the Rev. Dr. Adler, the Rev. Dr. Bondy, the Rev. S. M. Isaacs, the Rev. Messrs. Stembey, Philips, Cramer, who enjoyed the scene with much zest.

Mayor Gunther was present, with a large number of the élite of the city.

The festival, through the efforts of the young gentlemen who originated and carried it out, was a brilliant success in every respect, and all the guests were much pleased with the arrangements.

THE LIBATION.

BY ROSENBERG.

I.

Scatter out the remnants from the board
By youth and passion spread,
Yet, first be one libation poured—
A goblet to the dead,
Upon that living graveyard, Earth,
Not in sorrow, but in mirth.

II.

Spill the red cup to broken oaths
By friend or woman sworn,
Spill to the half forgotten troths
By time and trouble torn;
As runs the wine, such memories go—
Spill in laughter, not in woe.

III.

Pour out to rent or rusted ties,
Fond links of blood and birth—
The frailest facts and largest lies
That love can find on Earth.
What matters it that such things be?
Pour out out in grief, just glee.

IV.

Now lives and lies the void shall fill
Old lies and love have left,
Nor gear anew be hardened will
Of abuse in turn bereft;
Then, earn out first such things destroy—
Spill the cup, and spill in joy.

TWO CHAPTERS IN A WOMAN'S LIFE.

BY LIZZIE CAMPBELL.

CHAPTER I.

THE girl's face was partly turned away, because she could not quite control her features to keep down the rising tears of deep humiliation and pain; but soon a settled contempt and scorn drove all other expression from her countenance, and dried the moisture in her eyes. She turned suddenly towards Clarence Vaunton, and the brilliant hatred in her eyes and her haughty bearing startled an exclamation from him.

"Lucie!" he said. "You are not angry—you must see that I could not help it in this matter. Of course it is as painful to me as it can be to you, but I would really be doing you an injustice in pressing my claim when I may do so much better. I never could forgive myself if I stood in the way of your obtaining as high a position as was yours before this unlucky failure of your good father. You are, too, so accustomed to all the luxuries of wealth—no, I really never could forgive myself."

"Enough!" he say all that is generous and thoughtful; and, being so, I am sure you will pardon me if I must leave you now—my father requires my constant presence. Good morning, Mr. Vaunton."

And Miss Mansfield, with her wonted courtesy, rang for the servant to attend to Mr. Vaunton; and then slowly, like one in a dream, returned to her father's bedside.

The result on that was stricken into death; but Lucie did not know that the quiet, was, sleeping face on which her eyes rested, as she seated herself, would ever again be quiet, more pallid, and more rigid in a deeper sleep.

A dreary sigh heard its way up from her heart, while she sat there and thought of the future. The news of her father's failure had been a severe blow; but what was that to the mortification of having all her love, vows, her promises, her betrothal ring, returned to her, with

"I thank you—you are very good—but this is no doubt a sacrifice, and very likely you can do better elsewhere."

But all this would have been as nothing if she had not loved the man; and, overcome by this thought, her face went down into her rosy-white hands, and the tears that blustered her cheeks were not so much of shame and anger as of keen, bitter disappointment and sorrow.

"I loved him so, oh! I loved him so! Clarence, Clarence, my only love! If I could even feel that it was indeed a desire for my welfare that prompted him; but not even that crumb of consolation is denied me. He never loved me at all. I was nothing to him but the daughter of the wealthy Mr. Mansfield," and tears and sobs again took the place of words, and shook the girl's slender form like a whirlwind.

Mr. Mansfield moved uneasily and half awoke; and Lucie hastily plunged into the shade of the curtains, and then pouring the contents of a perfume bottle upon her handkerchief, passed it over her face and eyes and swollen eyes. The look of almost pitying scorn and contempt came back to her face again, as she did so. She raised the dainty, cut-glass bottle to the light in her hand, fully replaced the silver stopper; and then, placing it on her well-appointed, luxurious toilette stand, looked around on all the evidences of wealth that everywhere met her gaze.

"Fruit," she said, with a bitter smile, "I am surrounded with luxury—how shall I learn to wait upon myself and do without all those dainty attendants? I wonder he could have given me up so easily, while I had even the semblance of wealth surrounding me?" and then, as her gaze returned to the bed on which lay her stricken father—that luxurious, downy couch, with its lace hangings and satin coverlid—she shuddered to think how he would bear this change, the man grown old in the possession of wealth and all that it could purchase. The look of his face returned to her, as it was on that evening when he had entered her room three days before and proclaimed his ruin to her, as she stood putting the last touches to that grand toilette which was to strike all others into the shadow at the ball to which she was going. She felt again the speechless horror which had sent her reeling into a chair, and saw him, the moment after, lying senseless at her feet. How deathly cold his hand felt as she helped to lay him on the bed, and what a damp, clammy dew met her touch when she smoothed back the silver hair from his brow.

"My poor father! My poor, dear father! And his sorrow was all for me, I know. Whatever happens, he must never know this new blow that has fallen on me."

The tears stood in her eyes so thickly that she could not see that he was awake, and looking at her, till Mr. Mansfield spoke in a low, weak voice.

"Lucie—Lucie darling!"

She dashed the tears from her eyes and was by his side in the same moment; a strange—an indescribable change had come upon his face, and her heart beat thickly, with dread he was ill. She got out her hand mechanically to the bellrope, to summon aid, but he stayed her with a feeble gesture.

"Oh, father! Father, speak to me," she cried. "What is the matter, dear father?"

"I am ill, my child—very ill; I was doing it all for the best, Lucie; you are not angry with your poor old father."

"Oh, don't, don't, please don't speak so," she moaned, pressing his slender, shrivelled hands and covering them with tears and kisses.

"Thank you, Lucie; you were always a good girl; kiss me."

And Lucie pressed a passionate kiss upon the pale lips; and the flickering, happy smile that stole over the old man's face was frozen there by death.

Lucie Mansfield was an orphan.

Lonely, chilled by the breath of adversity, and all her early, loud, enthusiastic belief in the goodness of mankind shattered and broken, Lucie still lived and did her duties in the new phase of life which she found herself. They were not arduous duties one would have said; those of superintending the elaborate toilette of a rich young lady, and docile little girls, and acting as a sort of companion to their invalid mother; but, for many months, they were not congenial to the taste of Miss Mansfield.

One evening the Hastleys gave a party; and Miss Lucie was called upon to furnish the music. She calmly took her seat at the piano, and, without the least feeling either of anger or humiliation, although the consciousness of it was there more than one who had thought it an honor to be noticed even by a look from the wealthy merchant's daughter in the days of her fall, she continued to play everything that was asked for.

"Will you not sing for us, Miss Mansfield?" asked Mr. Hanley, with the manner of one who asks a favor.

Lucie's only answer was to touch the keys, and make the first ringing notes of a well-known ballade. She then took up the song, and her voice swelled out in melody till all the air was music. The last long sung cadence ended in the thrilling tone of which she could not rob her voice, but gradually she entered into the passionate power of the words of the song, and the very heart was melted at the sound; and tears and silence were the applause that greeted her when she ceased.

"And now may I beg you will excuse me, Mrs. Hanley," she said; "I am very tired, and I would like to go to my room."

"Certainly, my dear," was the kind reply, "and we are all very much obliged to you."

And Lucie was leaving the room, she felt a hand laid upon her arm, and turning met the eager gaze of a gentleman, who gave her no time to speak before he said, in a hurried voice:

"Mademoiselle must pardon me," he said, excitedly, "and allow me to introduce myself. I am Herr Metzinger, Professor of Music."

Lucie's bow at once acknowledged this introduction, and asked an explanation.

"I hope mademoiselle will not be offended, but does she know that her voice is worth fifty thousand dollars a year?"

"Indeed!" exclaimed Lucy, almost as eager as himself; and comprehending his full meaning at once.

"Indeed, yes; and, if mademoiselle will allow me, I will put her in the way of getting it."

"You are very kind, sir; pray call on me to-morrow; you have the interval to think of this. Good-night."

CHAPTER II.

THE Italian opera house in London was crowded; the fashionable season had just begun; and the operatic season was opened with Lucie Mansfield as the prima-donna.

Six years, and decided and brilliant success, had somewhat changed Le Mansfield from Miss Lucie Mansfield, New York belle and heiress—subsequently governess; but still, to the eye of love, or friendship, she was easily recognisable. Her pure white skin had grown more brilliant, become famous; and, of course, the prima-donna appeared in the role of Marguerite. It was partly owing to the change in her name—people said she was particularly well suited to it. Elegant and graceful in it ure; with the whitest neck and shoulders imaginable, and a face remarkable for loveliness; while the deep, dark, gray eyes, shaded with brown lashes, had a childlike innocence of expression, unimpaired by their depth and latent fire. Her hair was of that rare golden hue celebrated by poets, and common only in their verses. She was the very ideal of Goethe's Marguerite, and never lost sight of the character for a moment—from her first entrance till the sad finale.

Miss Mansfield was wall-known by reputation, though it was the first time she had ever appeared before a London audience; but she had been admired, adored, and fêted in Paris, in Brussels, in Cuba, in Madrid, and in many other cities, and her fame had ran before her to the metropolis of England. Her reception was enthusiastic, and before she had sung half of that most exquisite music the encores were both fatiguing and deafening.

Of all that multitude looking at and listening to her, there were two hearts at least that throbbed with very different emotions. The first of these was that which had no place in the bosom of the the young Earl of Avondale. This man had followed Miss Lucie from Brussels, where he had first seen her, to every town or village where she had sung since, till at last he found himself in London also, still following the woman whom he had loved from the first moment that delicious voice had penetrated to his heart and awoke the first and only passion of his life. When he had first laid a coronet at her feet Lucie was too recently recovered from the bitter disappointment of a wasted love to receive him favorably; and without stating any reason, she had kept him always at a distance. In truth, she was afraid to trust her affections on either of her own scoring; but, accepting the feeble encouragement contained in the fact that she had not absolutely rejected him, he hoped and waited.

The heart that beat with so different an emotion was that which sent forth the blood to all the tributary veins in the frame of Mr. Clarence Vaunton.

"By Jove! but I have been a fool" was this gentleman's reflection upon himself in the recesses of the performance. "This girl, whom I shook off from me as a beggar, turns out to be a very great prize indeed! And how she could love me, too, the pretty little puss! Heavens! but she is a beautiful woman! And see how the vast multitude pay homage to the music of her voice. Delicious! delicious! I would be the luckiest dog in Europe could I but call her mine. Ha! and why not? I have not seen her since then, and noble-hearted women love once it is for ever; she could not have suspected my motive in breaking off our engagement. Didn't seem to. Fool, I'm in luck! She cannot have forgotten me; and if she has retains a single spark of love for me, it will go hard but I'll fan it into a blaze."

"Clarence Vaunton."

Miss Mansfield read the name aloud once or twice, and then, very slightly, with just the faintest tinge of bitterness, thought:

"And this is the man I once loved—or thought I did. Yes, I loved him, and I have actually forgotten his name. Well, no need to be angry with myself; after all, it was Love I loved, not Clarence Vaunton. I wonder how he will feel when he finds that I am not an odd sensation of curiosity," she turned to the servant, who stood waiting: "Ask the gentleman to walk up, James."

Mr. Vaunton decided no point in his personal appearance at all likely to add to the general effect of his being the advanced guard towards the lady, he seized her hand and pressed it between both of his, and then apparently carried away by the feeling of the moment, he bent his head to the hand over it, and imprinted a warm, passionate kiss upon it. When at last he seemed to find his voice his words came low and fatteringly:

"Miss Mansfield—Lucie—do we then meet again at last?"

I am afraid Lucie was just a little disposed to laugh at this admirable though unfortunately transparent piece of acting. However, she restrained the inclination, and with a mischievous desire to do her part in the little play she foresaw was to succeed, asked for her admiration, she added:

"Did it then seem so long to you, Mr. Vaunton?"

"Ah, Lucie, can you ask?" was the impassioned answer. "Alas! my heart has grown old in waiting, in hoping for this day. But now I am repaid, I am the joy of this moment I am repaid for all."

"It is indeed a long time since we have met," she said, with well-feigned indifference Vaunton thought.

"Have you, too, thought it long, Lucie?"

"Well, really, Mr. Vaunton, six years can scarcely be called a brief period in the life of any one."

"It has been even longer than I thought," he returned, with a sigh. "Have you have forgotten the name that was once such music to my ears, when spoken by your dear lips. There was a time, Lucie, when you called me Clarence."

"Yes, Clarence," she answered, and sighed, and turning away, she looked afar off through the window. His face, with the smile she could not keep from her lips, or only to view the brilliant prospect without? Mr. Vaunton did not attribute it to either of these reasons, and he prolonged his visit to such a length that Lucie began to think her quondam lover something of a bore. At last, however, he took his departure, after gaining permission to come often.

Very triumphantly Mr. Vaunton took his way towards the Avondale House; he was radiant, he held his head high in air, and his feet seeming to touch nothing more solid than the same impalpable ether.

"She's mine!" he exclaimed, almost aloud. "Hurra! Clarence, my boy, you were always a clever fellow, but you have fairly surpassed yourself this time. Lucie Mansfield, I'll be even with you for all your pride, how could you forget me?"

Lucie was conscious of a half angry feeling with herself when she was left alone.

"And this is the end of my first love," she exclaimed. "Gone—gone—not even the ashes remaining. Heigh-ho! sic transit gloria—pshaw! Let me practise that little song. I'm not half satisfied with my rendering of it."

Mr. Vaunton was true to his determination to follow up the fortunate renewal of his acquaintance with Lucie, but wisely forbore to press his suit till he could still more firmly reinstate himself in her affections.

A telegraphic despatch, of great importance, took him out of town some few weeks after his first call upon Lucie, and urgent business detained him several days. But immediately on his return he hastened to pay his daily visit, determined to claim Lucie's hand on the plea of his long fidelity and the memory of their past betrothal. He was somewhat in doubt as to carry off the prize, having learned that more than one-half his fortune had been lost in a fruitless speculation.

Lucie's house, though not in the most fashionable, yet genuine than usual indications of her wealth this morning. As thought, and remarking this with a chuckle, Mr. Vaunton rang loudly. He, ha! she is afraid of losing me, and so sacks to allure me with the display of her wealth. Ah, no need, my pretty Lucie, no need! And the conquering hero rung the bell.

"Is Miss Mansfield at home?"

"My lady is in the drawing-room," answered the footman, "but she is not receiving to-day——"

"Oh, you know who I mean, you stupid fellow," laughed Vaunton, triumphantly tossing the man a sovereign, and running gaily upstairs, he entered the drawing-room with the freedom from ceremony of a privileged person.

"Ah, Lucie!" he exclaimed, seizing her hand, "you will forgive me, I know, when I tell you what very important business prevented me from coming here during the past few days."

"I have not any patience," and Lucie motioned the impassioned lover to a seat. Vaunton took it, but found it much too distant, and while he wondered if it was quite natural that delicate shade of coldness, he regarded the beautiful woman before him. She was more than usually lovely; the color of violet velvet dress fitting to the exquisite form; the delicate lace at the throat and wrists fastened with diamonds, and the magnificent hair coiled up with a pearl comb, served to display her regal loveliness by extraordinary advantage. He felt that he must lose no more time, and drawing his seat, he placed himself beside her, and with her hand fast imprisoned in his, poured forth a torrent of passionate love, and with more eloquence than when he had solicited the same boon, he concluded by praying her to become his wife.

For two or three brief moments Lucie regarded him with a faintly perceptible glance of scorn, but that soon passed away, and a smile dawned in its stead, but it was too sublime for him to feel even contempt towards him. Very firmly she drew away her hand however, and then she looked an irresistible, uncontrollable, merry laugh.

"You are the most inconsistent of men, Mr. Vaunton; what is it, Sir, you want?" she grave rously left me free, that I might, if possible, do better; and now, when I am in a position to profit by your kindness and good nature, you would be so mad as to make the same foolish old bargain again. Ha-ha! You are really too amusing, but fortunately I am saved from the possibility of falling by a fate so alluring. Harold, dearest," and she slightly raised her sweet voice. A handsome and elegant man seemingly.

"My dear, allow me to introduce Mr. Vaunton Clarence, this is my husband, the Earl of Avondale."

"I am very happy to meet any friend of yours, Lucie. We leave for the continent to-morrow, Mr. Vaunton; but Lady Avondale and myself will always be glad to see you when we return to England, or if we should meet abroad," said the peer courteously.

"Thank you, thank you," stammered Vaunton, and with a hasty good-morning, he hurried away.

ON AN OLD PORTRAIT.

Eyes that out-smiled the morn,
Behind your golden lashes,
What are your fine now?
Ashes!

Cheeks that out-blushed the rose,
White ones you have,
What is your beauty now?
Dust!

THE object which seemed so terrible to Maude Hillary was a pistol, a small pistol of very modern fashion, fresh and bright from the hands of the gunmaker. Mr. Hillary was not a man who affected sporting tastes, and Maude had never seen such a weapon in her father's possession until tonight—until this night, when vague fears respecting him had been present to her for a long time, only wanting a form into which to shape themselves.

It seemed as if her frivolous girlhood left her all at once. It seemed as if the years of luxury, coming upon her with such ghastly suddenness, transformed her into a woman—a woman possessed of a woman's direst anxieties, fortitude and self-abnegation. She uttered no cry of alarm, no exclamation of surprise, but she suddenly closed and locked the door on which she had stood, and dropped the bunch of keys into her pocket. Then kneeling down beside her father's chair, she put her two tenderly about him, and laid her head upon his breast. Mr. Hillary had grown very passive all at once, and sat idly staring at the table before him.

"Papa," Maude said presently, in a low, pleading voice, "what is it? tell me—confide in me. In whom should you trust if not in me? What is it, papa? What does it mean?"

"It means—ruin!" the merchant answered, briefly.

He did not turn toward his daughter, but still sat staring blankly straight before him.

"It means failure and ruin, Maude—ruin in its worst shape, its most hideous shape."

"You mean that we shall be poor, very poor; that we shall have to leave Twickenham; that you will be a clerk, perhaps, in some office and I a daily governess. I remember when the Gordons failed, and poor Constance Gordon and her brothers had to begin the world afresh, without money, and with very little help from their old friends. Do you think I could not bear as much as that and be happy still, if you were with me? Ah, papa, papa, do I seem such a helpless, useless creature, that you shrink from trusting me at such a time as this?"

Hysterical sobs rose in her throat, but she stifled them and went on talking to him in the same quiet, tender voice, and caressing him as she talked. He submitted passively enough to her caresses, but he seemed scarcely conscious of them.

"Trust me, papa; tell me everything. Such troubles as these seem so much less dreadful when once they have been freely spoken of. I remember how Mr. Gordon kept everything hidden from his family as long as he could; and Constance told me that it seemed as if a great cloud was hanging over the house, and there was something in the atmosphere that stifled them all. But when the crash came they bore it bravely; and see how well they have got on ever since, in a moderate way. Ah, papa, you have brought me up like a spoiled child, or a princess in a fairy tale, and now that trouble has come to us you think I cannot bear it. But I can, papa; if you will only be brave, your foolish, extravagant daughter will learn to be wise and patient. I was I was getting very tired of Twickenham, papa, and shall be as happy as the day is long in a nice little cottage, in some cheap suburb, where I can have pupils."

Lionel Hillary ought no doubt to have been comforted by his daughter's tenderness; but, unhappily, there are some wounds so cruelly inflamed that the gentlest application the surgeon can devise is apt to chafe and irritate them. The girl's talk jarred upon the merchant's mind, and it was with a shiver of pain that he turned to her as she left off speaking.

"Child, child," he exclaimed, fretfully, "you don't know what you're talking of. Do you think it is such an easy thing to pass from one of the first positions in the city to a clerkship and a cottage in the suburbs? Do you think there is nothing between such opposite conditions? Do you suppose I have only to shut up my books and wish my creditors good-morning, before I walk out of my office? You talk and think like a child, Maude. It is all very well for an old twaddler like John Gordon, who suspends payment upon the first failure that affects his stability, and who winds up his affairs with a dividend of fifteen shillings in the pound, and the compliments and sympathy of all Basinghall street. No one will sympathise with my fall, though more than I can count will suffer with me. I am not a man to drop under the first blow, Maude; for nearly three years I have been working a rotten ship, with the knowledge that nothing short of a miracle could save me from wreck. The wreck has come. The world will call me a dishonest man because I waited for that miracle. I waited as the gambler waits at the green table, hoping that the last risk would bring me salvation. With me ruin means disgrace. I tell you, Maude, before the month is out there will be a panic in the city, and men will cry out that Lionel Hillary is a rogue and swindler. There's not a man who ever dined at Twickenham that won't use his knowledge of my home as a weapon against me. There's not a bottle of wine I ever gave a friend whose price and quality will not be made a reproach against me. Oh! I know how people talk about these things. Go away, child. Your presence only goads and irritates me. It reminds me that I might have done better than I have done, I might have been wiser, I might have saved something—my good name at least. I have loved you so dearly, Maude—heaven knows how dearly, for I am no man of big words or sentimental phrases. And now I leave you utterly destitute, the pauper child of a disgraced father."

"But you shall not leave me," cried Maude, with a sudden energy that startled Lionel Hillary. "Papa, why do you insist upon treating me as a child? Why do you judge me by what I have been, rather than by what I can be? Why won't you trust me? why won't you talk to me as if I were a son, and had a right to share your secrets? You have told me the worst, and you see I can bear to know it. I can endure even disgrace; but I cannot bear to lose you. Trust me, papa. I will be patient under any calamity except—" She was seized with a sudden shivering, and clung to him, with a convulsive force in the small hands that entwined themselves about his arm. "You know what I mean, papa," she said. "Believe that I can bear anything if you will be true, and brave, and patient. And even yet the miracle may come. Something may happen at the very last, surely it may, to save your good name."

Mr. Hillary pressed his daughter's hand in acknowledgment of so much tenderness and devotion; but he shook his head moodily as he answered her:

"Nothing can happen to save me, unless twenty thousand pounds drop from the skies between this and the 10th of January."

Twenty thousand pounds! Maude's thoughts flew to her jewel-case in obedience to the most universal of feminine instincts. Twenty thousand pounds! Alas for that birthday gift of opals and diamonds, the turquoise rings and bracelets, the emerald cross, the delicate pink coral, and all the fragile fantastic toys of gold and enamel, bought in the dearest market of elegant West End dealers, who give three years credit! Maude, in all her ignorance, was wise enough to know that these things would not realise one of the twenty thousands required by her father.

"But there is Twickenham, papa," she said; "the Cedars must be worth ever so many thousands."

"And is mortgaged to the full extent of its value," answered Mr. Hillary. "Find me twenty thousand pounds if you can, Maude, but don't worry me with frivolous suggestions. I tell you that it is quite impossible for a woman to understand my position. God help me! I scarcely understand it myself. I only know that everything round me is so much rottenness, and that the crash must come next month."

"But you will not think—of that—again?" urged Maude, pointing to the drawer.

"No; I will wait to the tenth."

"For my sake, oh, papa, for my sake."

"No, child; not for your sake, but from a selfish, cowardly clinging to life," cried Lionel Hillary, with sudden passion. "It would be better for you, ten times better, if I were dead. The thought of that was in my mind as I came down here to-night, until the noise of the engine almost seemed to thump out the words, 'Better for her, better for her.' People would have mercy upon you if I were dead, Maude; even those who suffered by me would be less bitter in their reproaches if I were dead. A man can only break his heart once, and when the man is dead, there is no mark for the arrows of justifiable reproach, or the foul garden stuff and rotten eggs of malicious calumny."

"Papa, the help may come; the twenty thousand pounds may be found."

"No, child; there was only one hope of that, and the hope is gone."

For the first time that night Mr. Hillary looked at his daughter; she saw the look, an anxious scrutiny that sent a chill through her heart. She did not ask him what that one hope had been.

"Papa, trust in me, only trust in me!" she cried; "you do not know of what I am capable for your sake—for your sake. You don't know what I have suffered to-night, and how changed I am by that suffering. Hope for a miracle even, papa; keep things as smooth as you can, and between this and the tenth the twenty thousand pounds may be found. Only tell me one thing. You don't want any one to give you the money! If it were lent to you, you could repay it by-and-bye?"

"Yes; with sufficient time I could repay it."

"Then hope for the miracle, papa. Ah! you think me such a child that you are almost angry with me for telling you to hope; but the lion laughed at the mouse, I dare say."

Five minutes after this, Miss Hillary led her father to his room and wished him good-night, cheerfully enough, upon the threshold. But under that pretence of cheerfulness, cruel fears and perplexities were torturing her innocent heart. Ruin, dishonor, disgrace; the misery of many homes besides that one household on the bank of the river—all these terrors had come very suddenly upon the girl who only that morning had been impatient of the December weather and the dull gray sky.

She went to her room, but only to sit with the door open, listening for any sound in her father's apartment, which was next her own. She sat for nearly two hours shivering with cold, and then crept softly to her father's room and opened the door. The merchant was sleeping, peacefully enough to all appearance, for his breathing was tranquil and regular; so Maude went back to her room. It seemed the bitterest mockery to go to bed, but then Miss Hillary's maid would have been scandalized had she come at eight o'clock and found her mistress still watching. Alas, poor Maude! for the first time in her life she had to submit to that most cruel social penance, entitled "keeping up appearances." She went to bed, and though she seemed to hear every hour, and half-hour, and quarter of an hour chimed by the church clocks, she must have slept at some time or other in that brief remainder of the night, or else how should she have been tormented by those hideous dreams, in which she was always wading through black morasses and turgid waters, carrying in her arms a great bag of gold, which she vainly strove to convey to her father?

CHAPTER XVI.—A DRAMA THAT WAS ACTED BEHIND THE SCENES.

Mr. Hillary escorted his daughter and Julia Desmond back to Twickenham upon the day following that night scene of anguish and terror. They left Brighton rather late in the day, and arrived at the Cedars when the early winter evening had closed in upon the leafless avenues and groves about the old house. Lights were burning cheerily in the long range of lower windows, and in the vestibule and inner hall, and rare groups of stainless marble gleamed white against a background of bright hothouse flowers. Deferential servants came hurrying out as the carriage drove up, and Miss Hillary, seeing her home in all its accustomed brightness and comfort, felt a painful sense of bewilderment. It was so difficult to realise the force of that calamity which had been so lately revealed to her; it was so difficult to believe that all this splendor was so much rottenness, from which there was only one step to poverty and disgrace.

Mr. Hillary had visited his daughter's room very early upon the morning after the terrible confidence between them, and had impressed upon her the necessity of suppressing every evidence of the knowledge that had come to her.

"I have been compelled to trust you, Maude," he said, "and you must prove yourself worthy of my confidence. Heaven only knows how difficult it has been to me to keep the secrets of my business during three years of reverses and misfortunes such as rarely fall to the lot of a speculator. My only chance of floating over this crisis lies in the meeting with some friend who will lend me the money I want, without looking too closely into the nature of the security I have to offer. But let the state of my affairs once get wind, and all hope of retrieval would be lost. Remember this, Maude, and, if you love me, show a bright face to the world; and above all, beware of Julia Desmond. That young lady is a dangerous person, my dear, and the day may come when we shall have reason to regret having given a shelter to old Desmond's destitute child."

"But Julia is a dear good girl, papa; she would be very sorry for us, I am sure," Maude pleaded, innocently.

"Julia has contrived to feather her own nest so remarkably well, that she would be very indifferent to any calamity that could come to her friends," answered the practical man of the world, who had been by no means pleased with Miss Desmond since that young lady's conquest of Francis Tredethlyn.

Maude kissed her father—ah, how passionately! She clung to him as she remembered that long feverish dream of the previous night, and the glittering something lying in the drawer; she kissed him, and promised that his secrets should be guarded more carefully than her own life.

"And the miracle may be accomplished between this and the tenth of January, papa," she said.

And then, as Lionel Hillary was about to leave his daughter's room, she placed herself suddenly between him and the door, and turned the key in the lock. He looked at her, surprised and perplexed.

"Maude!"

"Dearest father, you have trusted me, and you have exacted a promise from me," said Miss Hillary, with a quiet calmness that was more impressive than any vehemence of manner; "and now I want you to give me a promise, a very solemn promise, my own dear father."

She put her hand upon his shoulder and kissed him once more, clinging to him fondly, looking tenderly upward to his pale, careworn face. Then she took a bunch of keys from her pocket and held them out before him.

"You remember those keys, papa; I am going to return them to you; but I want you to kneel down with me here, now when all that feverish excitement of last night has passed away; I want you to promise me, as you hope for mercy and happiness in a better world when this life is all gone by and done with—I want you to promise me that you will never again, under any circumstances, in any hour of trial or temptation, think of that dreadful alternative of which you thought last night. "Oh, papa! remember it is such a terrible sin even to think of it; for we can never do so until we have ceased to trust in God."

The simple words went straight to Lionel Hillary's heart, that world-weary heart, in which there was but this one tender quality of paternal love still left. No subtle arguments of theologian or philosopher could have so deeply influenced him as his daughter's gentle pleading. He knelt by her side, close to a little table, on which an open Testament was lying, and pressing his lips upon the sacred page, swore that he would never again contemplate the sin which he had so nearly committed only a few hours before.

"It is a coward's remedy at the best," he said presently; and then he took his daughter in his arms and looked down at her tearful face with a mist before his own eyes, which made that bright young beauty seem blotted and dim. "My Maude, my darling, surely heaven must have created you to be my guardian angel. I have not been a good man, I have been too much of a speculator for the last few years—a reckless speculator, perhaps; but when the demon of commercial hazard had his grip strongest upon me your image was always in my mind. I wanted to leave you rich, secure from all the troubles of this world. I was a poor man in my young days, Maude, and perhaps the bitterness of that early time may have taught me to set too high a value upon wealth. Fortune came to me afterwards, almost as wonderfully as it comes to a prince in a fairy tale, and some recklessness of spirit may have engendered in me by my own successes and by the times in which I have lived."

"But, dear papa, you need not fear poverty for my sake," said Maude; "only trust in me, and when the time comes you shall find me ready to face it. My life has been very pleasant—too pleasant, I dare say—I have always felt that it was so when the thought has come to me of all the people that suffer in this world. But you know how the princess in the fairy tale, who has never known a sorrow, goes out all at once into the great forest, more helpless and lonely than the poorest woodman's daughter, and yet no harm ever comes to the princess, papa. If it will only please heaven to spare your good name, poverty will have no sting for me; and if disgrace should come, I will bear it for your sake—I will bear it without a murmur for your sake, papa."

She broke down just a little as she said this; she could not speak quite calmly of that most terrible loss of all—the loss of her father's commercial honor. She remembered, very dimly, long prosy discussions that she had heard at Mr. Hillary's dinner-table about men who had failed, and who had failed through some dishonesty or recklessness of their own, and whose downfall had involved the hard-won fortunes of others, making a vast circle of ruin, spreading as the watery circle spreads when you drop a pebble into a tideless lake.

SCHEDULE OF THE PROPERTY

Owned by the New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore Consolidated Petroleum and Mining Company.

Organized under the Laws of the State of New York. Capital Stock $,500,000, in 300,000 shares of $5 each—par value. A limited amount of stock at $1 per share, subscription price, liable to no further call or assessment—50,000 shares reserved for a working capital.

Offices.—The principal office is in New York, with branch offices in Philadelphia and Baltimore, for the convenience of the shareholders.

Wells.

There are in all 13 wells already on the property, some of which are producing with good prospects of an immensely large increase in a short time—and 10 of which (new wells) are being bored with vigor and rapidly approaching completion, some of them being down 400 feet and with splendid show of oil.

Near to some of the properties and wells now in process of boring, belonging to this company, are the following great wells, which will show the great value of the company's property and the immense returns which may be expected to be realised to the shareholders of the company.

The Phillips Well on the Tarr Farm, which flowed when struck over 4,000 barrels per day. The Woodford Well, on Tarr Farm, flowed 2,000 barrels per day. The Sherman Well flowed 3,000 barrels per day. The Hammond Well on Steel Farm flowed 500 barrels per day. The Christie Well flowed 1,500 barrels per day. The Read Well on Cherry Run flowed 400 barrels per day. The Yankee Well, 200 barrels per day. The Auburn Well, 150 barrels per day.

Besides those mentioned there are many fine producing wells, near above and below, in the immediate vicinity of this company's properties, yielding from 300 to 1,000 barrels per day.

A new 200 barrel well has been struck on Cherry Run, above the Reed Well, close to the property of this company, on the McFate Farm, on which one of the company's wells is almost completed, with splendid prospects of oil. Another well, on the Hogg Farm, close to this, is also nearly down, with equally great prospects. A new 150 barrel well, of fine lubricating oil, has been struck on Sugar Creek (the first well bored), adjoining the Saunders Farm, the property of this company, on which a well is nearly completed, with splendid show of oil.

One acre (of the seven acres Homestead Reserve) on the Saunders Farm, which farm belongs to this company, was sold a few days since for $15,000 cash.

This company has five different properties on Sugar Creek, and it is estimated by experienced oil men that they are now worth over one million of dollars ($1,000,000), and the entire properties of the company, located on the various rich oil streams mentioned before, worth over five millions of dollars ($5,000,000).

It is not only a possibility, but a strong probability, that large wells will be struck on this company's property yielding several hundred barrels, and perhaps several thousand barrels of oil per day, which would make the stock of the company very valuable, and yield to the shareholders very large dividends.

No. 1.—Is a tract of land of 57 acres in fee simple, situated on Sugar Creek, Sugar Creek Township, Venango County, Pennsylvania, and known as the Saunders Farm, originally a part of and the upper end of the Russel Farm. This property is all flat, and embraces the entire width of the valley, extending from bluff to bluff. This interest carries with it one engine and house, derrick, drilling-tools, etc. There is a well being bored on this farm, while two more are going down adjoining above, and two below, one of which is now producing 25 barrels per day of lubricating oil.

No. 2.—One lease of three lots of ground on Cherry Run, bottom land, with 100 feet of the sulphur spring on the McFate Farm. This property is a short distance from the celebrated Read Well, Yankee, Auburn and other wells, no flowing from 25 to 280 barrels per day. Working interest, five-twelfths of the oil. One engine, derrick, engine-house. Well going down.

No. 3.—One-tenth interest in a lease on Blood Farm, on Oil Creek. One well down, now pumping from 10 to 15 barrels per day. Room for two more wells. Same interest in engine, derrick and fixtures.

No. 4.—A one-fourth interest in a lease on the Steel Farm, better known as the Widow McClintock Farm. One well down, pumping 10 barrels per day, and another well down about 400 feet (new well). This interest includes the one-eighth of all the oil, and the one-quarter of two engines, one air-pump, together with tubing and fixtures for two wells, complete.

No. 5.—One-sixteenth working interest in a lease on Steel Farm, known and numbered on plot of said farm as Lot 23, and as Perry Well. This property has one well now down, with room for three more wells.

No. 6.—One-sixteenth interest in Lot No. 7, on Steel Farm, as per plot of said farm. This property has one well down, producing 15 barrels per day, with room for four more wells, together with one engine and fixtures.

No. 7.—One-sixteenth working interest in Lot No. 11, Steel Farm, with one-sixteenth interest in one engine and machinery. All the above property on this farm, viz., Nos. 4, 5, 6 and 7, is of the most valuable oil-producing territory on Oil Creek, with wells on adjoining lots producing from 25 to 240 barrels per day each.

No. 8.—The one-fourth working interest in a lease on the Tarr Farm, with the one-fourth of engine, tubing, tanks, etc., necessary for operating. One well going down. This interest claims one-eighth of all the oil.

No. 9.—The one-quarter interest in well and lease on Walnut Bend, opposite Horse Creek, Alleghany River; one well in operation, producing from 10 to 15 barrels per day; lease large enough to put down several more wells.

No. 10.—Lease of one acre of land on Cherry Tree Creek, adjoining the Dempsey Farm, all flat land, lying on both sides of the Creek. This interest receives three-quarters of all the oil. One engine, derrick, engine-house and necessary fixtures for operating.

No. 11.—One lease on Dempsey Farm, known as Lot No. 25, according to survey of said farm. The interest includes the whole working interest, being one-half of all the oil. One derrick, engine, and all necessary fixtures for putting down a well. Well going down.

No. 12.—A lease of five acres on Sugar Creek, Oakland Township, Venango County, Pennsylvania, and known as the David Reynolds' lease, which lease extends for the term of 20 years from the 16th day of September, A. D. 1864. This lease carries three-quarters of all the oil.

No. 13.—A lease of eleven acres of land on Sugar Creek, all flat land, and known as the Arthamer Davison lease. This property is leased for 40 years, giving the land-holders one-seventh of the oil only.

No. 14.—A lease of 60 acres of land, lying on a branch of Sugar Creek, below Cooperstown, leased for the term of 40 years, lease drawing seven-eighths of all the oil.

No. 15.—Three-fourths of the working interest of half an acre on Cherry Run, on farm known as Hogg Farm, and is most favorably situated. The above interest carries with it three-quarters of the derrick, engine-house, engine, and all necessary fixtures for operating. Well now going down.

No. 16.—Is a lease of a piece or parcel of land situated in Franklin Township, Erie county, Pennsylvania, it being the farm formerly known as the John L. Rhodes Farm, containing about 64 acres, more or less. This property is situated on Elk Creek. Lease is one-half of all the oil produced.

No. 17.—Is a leasehold of piece or parcel of land situated in Gudgenville, Girard Township, Erie County, State of Pennsylvania, and bounded by L. C. Kent, Cortecy, and others, containing sixty-four (64) acres, more or less. This property is considered good oil territory, carrying with it the one-half of all the oil found. There are a number of oil springs in the immediate vicinity.

No. 18.—Comprises a leasehold of piece or parcel of land situated in Fairview Township, Erie County, Pennsylvania, containing about ten (10) acres. This property is situated on Elk Creek, favorably located, and carries with it one-half of all the oil produced.

No. 19.—Is a leasehold of a piece of land situated in Girard Township, Erie County, State of Pennsylvania, known as the Wilcox Farm, containing about 180 acres. This property is located on Elk Creek, in the above township, embracing all the flat land lying between the bluffs on each side of the creek. This lease carries one-half of all the oil.

THE FRENCH HUGUENOT CHURCHYARD, CHURCH STREET, CHARLESTON, S. C.

BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF CHARLESTON, S. C.

THE panoramic sketch we publish to-day of Charleston is the most eloquent sermon against rebellion ever preached. Our Artist says:

"My sketch is taken from the top of the Mills House, looking N. N.W., up Meeting street. This is the best locality from which to view the burned district. The fire occurred Dec. 13, 1861, and the burned district remains in its charred and desolate state. On the lower right hand corner of the picture are the ruins of the South Carolina Institute, in which the Act of Secession was passed. Next to that, on the extreme right, is St. Philip's church, whose tall white spire stands amid the ruins, and desolation around it, like some mammoth sepulchral sentinel. In the rear of this church is stationed the new Custom-House, which is yet unfinished. On the right side of the city flows the Cooper river, while the Ashley river bounds it on the left. I have seldom looked upon a more dismal sight than Charleston is now. We must at least give its citizens credit for the fortitude with which they have endured their disgrace for most certainly our officers were not aware of one-half the damage our fire had inflicted."

French Huguenot Churchyard.

The sketch we present showing the effect of our shelling upon the churchyard of the French Huguenots in Church street, will give our readers a correct idea of how far-reaching our missiles were. It speaks for itself.

Interior of State Bank of South Carolina.

Our Artist found this once wealthy bank in ruins, the furniture destroyed, the walls disfigured by our shells, and the literary matter of the establishment, as cheques and blanks of various kinds, given over to the cunning architects of rats' nests and crows' nests. The Confederate credit is very fairly indicated by our picture of the bank at Charleston.

EGYPTIAN TROOPS.—There is a battalion of Egyptian troops serving with the French army in Mexico. This corps is composed of 600 volunteers, and was offered by the Viceroy of Egypt to the Emperor Napoleon to take part in the rude warfare in Mexico. These terrible black soldiers speak neither French nor Mexican. They only obey their own officers, but their discipline is marvellous. They are cruel towards the guerillas, whom they tie to trees, and whose heads and hands they cut off, and whom they kill with yataghans in reprisal for the death of one of their comrades, who was surprised at Chiequella, and was cut in pieces, and scattered about their camp by the guerillas. This cruel act has excited the rage of the black soldiers, and furnishes the explanation, if not the excuse, for their conduct. They are on detached service in the hotter regions, and they occupy a position in the shape of a large crescent. At the least alarm or sound of alarm they turn out as sharpshooters, and advance bravely, even if it is one against 50. They are as active as panthers, nothing checks them, neither thickets, ravines, nor the escarpments of mountains, nor works constructed by military science. In an incredibly short time they will cover the astonishing distance of 15 leagues without halting. They are faithful to their Mahometan creed, and never drink fermented liquors. They have been extremely obliging towards the French army, and have done the most laborious fatigue work, such as pitching tents, cutting wood for fuel, and bringing water from long distances for the camp.

THERE is now a proposal to erect a monument to Leonardo de Vinci in the Chateau of Amboise, France, on the spot where his remains were recently discovered. The form of this work of art has not been decided on, but the pedestal would bear simply the words "Francois I. a appelé Léonard de Vinci en France. Napoleon III. lui a élevé un monument." (Francis I. called Leonardo de Vinci to France. Napoleon III. has raised a monument to his memory). The Mayor of Amboise has written a letter to M. Arsène Houssaye, Inspector-General of Fine Arts, on the subject, at the same time thanking that gentleman for his aid in the discovery of that great painter's burial place.

INTERIOR OF THE STATE BANK OF SOUTH CAROLINA, CHARLESTON, SHOWING THE EFFECT OF OUR SHELLS.

CAPT. J. S. CLARK.

CAPT. JOSEPH S. CLARK, PRESIDENT OF THE NEW YORK, PHILADELPHIA AND BALTIMORE CONSOLIDATED PETROLEUM AND MINING COMPANY.

THE subject of our sketch, Capt. Joseph S. Clark, was born in Kent county, State of New York, in 1814. He was the youngest son of a large family, and losing his parents early in life, he was left, in a measure, to carve out a way in the world for himself. The desire to go forth and seek his fortune, so common in our boys of ten years of age, impelled him to leave his home for a journey whose direction was unknown, and whose end was uncertain. The second day of his travels, while trudging a-foot along the road to Shoreham, Vermont, he encountered a Massachusetts pedlar, who became interested in the fortunes of the lad, and engaged him to take charge of the horse and wagon, which contained the stock-in-trade of a company of some eighteen feet pedlars, who met at certain points and replenished their stocks from the wagon, which was, in fact, a peripatetic retail store. In those days there was a large number of such companies organised throughout the New England States.

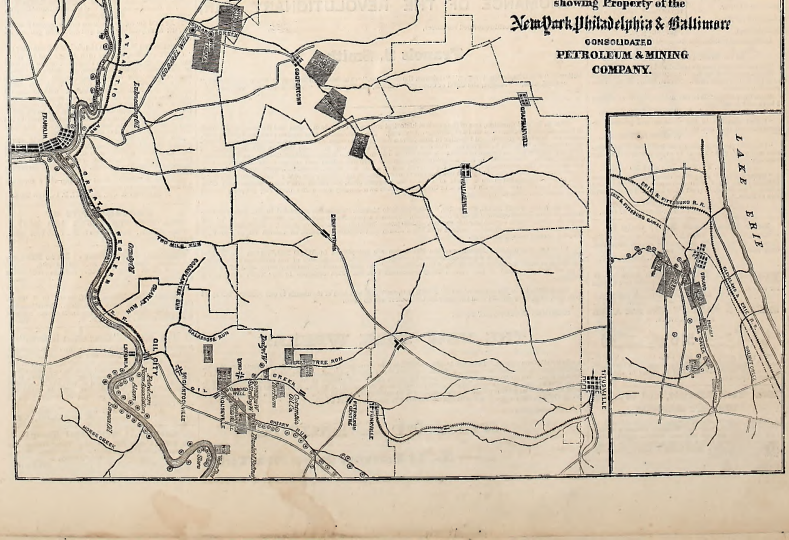
He continued in this occupation for two years, during which time he learned the value of small things, and acquired a general though unscientific knowledge of trading, which served him well in after life. Becoming tired of this occupation, and feeling a growing passion to see foreign countries, he bade farewell to his friends the pedlars, and, coming to New York, soon obtained a situation as boy on board a ship. From that time he followed the sea as a profession. His progress upwards was slow but sure, for though he had neither parent nor capital, he had an indomitable will and a desire to rise, which made him lose no opportunity for improvement or of advantage which would aid him to reach the goal of his ambition. He passed through every grade, from boy before the mast to first officer, until finally he found himself commander of the beautiful Clyde built steamship Argyll, at the early age of 23. The Argyll was the first steamship that ever navigated the waters of the Mexican Gulf or the Caribbean Sea.

In 1841, Capt. Clark, by economy and industry, was enabled to purchase the controlling interest in the ship he commanded, and in this position he brought into practical use the knowledge of "trading" which he had acquired in the humble capacity of a Massachusetts pedlar. This knowledge of trading is of vital importance to the success of a mercantile shipmaster, for, acting as his own factor, he selects his cargoes to suit the market, according to experience acquired by years of personal observation, and knowing what is of value at exchange between port and port, is rarely necessitated to sail out in ballast.

From 1841 to 1862 Capt. Clark pursued his profession, combining the shipmaster with the merchant, which profession he took an honest pride in, for had he not achieved it by the force of his own will? A self-made man may well be proud of the beginnings of his success.

At the breaking out of the Southern rebellion Capt. Clark was in China with his ship. He remained there until June, 1861, when, finding that he could not with safety bring his ship home under the flag of his country, he took her to Melbourne, Australia, where he sold her out, taking passage to England with his family, for his wife and children always accompanied him in his voyages, in the famous ship Kent, of London, England. This voyage was a memorable one, and the dangers which the ship passed through and the manner of its miraculous preservation was the theme of universal comment in the English press.

When off Cape Horn the Kent encountered a hurricane, which exceeded in violence all that the oldest seaman had ever known. For three days and three nights, the 12th, 14th and 15th of August, the storm raged without intermission, the cabins and upper decks were all swept away, most of the crew disabled by overwork and the rest disheartened, and the ship, utterly beyond control, lay laboring in the trough of the sea, a helpless wreck, in momentary danger of foundering. Then it was that Capt. Clark's greatest experience, and his never-yielding determination to overcome all obstacles, stood out in bold relief. The captain of the Kent, a fair sailor under ordinary circumstances, was paralyzed by the imminence of the situation. Giving up the ship for lost, he left the deck, and going among the passengers, bade them prepare to meet their God, for the ship would not live an hour. The scene which followed this announcement may be better imagined than described.



There were between two and three hundred passengers, among them delicate women and children, whole families returning to their homes. Terror seized them all, and their cries, their wailings and their prayers for help were heartrending. Capt. Clark had his own family on board, and did not comprehend the meaning of giving up the ship without a struggle for life. He sought the captain and told him he did not see their situation in that light, and asked permission to try his hand at the work of salvation. It was granted, and he proceeded at once to rouse such of the crew as were able to do duty, found many of the passengers who were willing to lend a hand, spoke words of comfort, and exhibited his faith by work, and in two hours, by certain nautical devices, got the ship's head round, hoisted the only stitch of canvas that had been saved, and enabled the staunch vessel to ride out the remainder of the hurricane and reach her port in safety.

On reaching London the passengers published a card of thanks to Capt. Clark, which contained all that words could express of gratitude, and the London Times devoted two columns to the details of the perilous voyage, paying a noble tribute to the undaunted heroism and masterly skill of the man who had rescued so many human souls from the horror of a watery grave.

On his return to America, Capt. Clark's attention was directed to the development of the petroleum oil district, and he entered into the new business with the same determination which had carried him so successfully through all his speculations in life. He recognised that the first element of success was a thorough knowledge of the subject, practically learned by personal investigation. This he gave it, spending many months in inspecting the whole region, and gathering information from every source from which it could be reliably obtained.

Capt. Clark relates many anecdotes, and tells many a story of his travels through the gold regions of California, Australia and New Zealand, enough to fill a large volume; but admits that after looking over all the gold fields, and the successes of the many thousands rushing to them in pursuit of that precious metal that appears to be a little nearer to us than ever, there is none of them to be compared with the great petroleum chances, almost every day offering to those that seek for oil. It is not strange that after passing through all the gold fevers without catching the contagion, that he should look upon this new fever with suspicion, which he did for the first year of his stay on Oil creek, and, to use his own words, missed many a good chance. The first of which, he says, was an offer of the one-fourth of the famous Maple Shade well when struck, for $700. In less than one month after that one-fourth of the well was worth $300,000; after many such chances had slipped from him during the first year in Oil creek, his nerves were somewhat strengthened by the constant application of oil, and at last he made a venture for himself. His judgment being ripened by experience, his venture was a success, and he has gone on since then, increasing his connection with the oil interest until the present day, when we find him a founder in five different stable companies, having organised two himself, one in Philadelphia and the other in this city, called "The New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore Consolidated Petroleum and Mining Company," the stock of which has sold so rapidly that the books were closed on the first of March, so that no more stock can be had at the subscription price. The property upon which this company is based has all been selected by Capt. Clark himself, and is at the present time paying interest from wells in operation. It is one of the best mediums for investment in the market.

Capt. Clark is also interested in one of, if not the very best refineries in this or any other country; we believe the Standard Petroleum Refinery of Pittsburg, Penn., is largest in the world. It has the capacity of refining 3,000 barrels of oil per month, which, allowing 60 gallons to the barrel, would give the enormous sum of 150,000 gallons, on which the Government receives a revenue of 10 cents per gallon. We would advise any one visiting Pittsburg to inspect the Standard Refinery. Doctor H. C. W. Tweddle, the proprietor and builder, takes pleasure in showing all who visit the refinery through the different departments. He will well pay any one failing an interest in the great developments of that truly wonderful product, petroleum oil.

A CERTAIN poetaster was to meet Charles Lamb at dinner, and some of the poems were shown to Lamb a little before the author's arrival. When he came he proved to be empty and conceited. During dinner Lamb fell into the delightful mystery of saying, now and again, "That reminds me of some verses I wrote when I was very young," and then quoted a line or two, which he recollected, from the gentleman's book, to the latter's amazement and indignation. Lunch, immensely diverted, capped it all by introducing the first lines of "Paradise Lost." "Of man's first disobedience," as also written by himself, which actually brought the gentleman on his feet, hurrying with rage. He said he had sat by and allowed his own "little verses" to be taken without protest, but he could not endure to see Milton pilfered.

WE would call special attention to B. T. Hayward's advertisement, in another department of this issue. Our gallant troops in the Union service can obtain from him every desirable style of Company, Regimental, Brigade, Division or Corps Flag, Badges or Emblems. As every patriot prides himself on his particular Company, Regiment or Corps, and wishes to decorate his manly breast with an honorable Badge, designating his service, and, thousands, not knowing how to obtain them, we take pleasure in referring them to Mr. Hayward's advertisement, in which will be found all that is desired in that line. Mr. Hayward is one of our largest and oldest Manufacturing Jewelers, and is the leading manufacturer of the Army Badges. In fact, he is the only reliable house to deal with. He can be relied upon for quality of goods, promptness and faithfulness in filling all orders. Our "Masonic" friends will also find everything in their line appertaining to masonry.—Army and Home Journal.

"DEATH AND DESTRUCTION TO THE BRITISH INVADERS!"

The hag a wild and hideous thing—
The youth a patriot brave—
She only thought of sweet revenge—
He would his country save.
The goddess shrined within her breast
Was withering, black-hroved hate—
He only sighed to win a bride,
And see his country great.
"Ruth Roy shall never be thy bride,
Dick Champ, now mark me well!"
Out! cried Ruth Roy with the patriot cried,
"I'll win her yet, Wild Nell!"

NOW READY

in the columns of

THE NEW YORK WEEKLY,

(Universally acknowledged to be the most attractive Story and Sketch Paper in the world), a story of great power and transcendent beauty, entitled

WILD NELL, THE SPY;

OR,

THE FOUNDLINGS OF THE FOREST.

A ROMANCE OF THE REVOLUTIONARY WAR,

from the pen of the world-renowned romancer,

Francis S. Smith,

Author of "White Eagle, the Avenger," "Gabriau, the Gladiator," "The Sexton of Searsy," "Rookwood, the Ranger," "Asael Rain," "Maggie, the Child of Charity," "Lilian, the Wanderer," "Evelesh Wilson," etc., etc.

This is, beyond question, one of the greatest historical romances of modern times; and it possesses the merit of being highly instructive as well as intensely interesting. The main incidents of the story are strictly historical, and these incidents are grouped together in so artistic a manner as to form of the whole one of the most absorbing romances ever given to the world. There is many a person who will not wade through the dry details of history; but there is no person of either s x who would fail to become fairly spellbound while reading this entrancing work. The author, in fact, takes those who are averse to dry details and makes them acquainted with the history of the Revolution in spite of themselves, and in a way, too, which renders forgetfulness of the fa t impossible. It is not everybody who has the gift of weaving exciting romance out of dry details—for a great gift it is, and one calculated to do a world of good when properly used, for surely every man, woman and child should at least be familiar with that era of the history of his own country which has been very properly termed "the times that tried men's souls."

In perusing WILD NELL, the reader, unconsciously to himself, becomes so interested in the characters introduced as to almost consider himself one of them. There is a peculiar charm about the style in which the story is written which carries say one captive, and he passes through the ebbs of daring, hairbreadth escapes, acts of heroism, and touching love scenes with bated breath and fast-beating heart, as though he or she were actually moving among the group.

All the most prominent characters of the Revolution are introduced in WILD NELL, from the Goddess Washington herself down to the famous Benedict Champ, who escaped the capture of the infamous Arnold after the escape of the latter. The particulars of the execution of the patriot-martyr Captain Nathan Hale, of Connecticut, are also given, and in fact almost every prominent incident which occurred in our great struggle for freedom.

The popularity of the author of WILD NELL will, we know, add tens of thousands to our readers; but apart from this, everybody will read the story for the good it will do them.

CERTIFICATES, naming each Article and its value, are placed in SEALED ENVELOPES, which are well mixed. One of these Envelopes, containing the Certificate, in order for every Article, is sold for One Dollar at retail, will be delivered at our office or sent by mail to any address, without choice, on receipt of 25 cents. On receiving the Certificate the purchaser will see what Article it entitles him to, and, if not satisfied in all cases, six Certificates for $1 thereafter.

A SAMPLE will be sent on the receipt of ONE DOLLAR and receive the Article named, or can choose any other Article of equal value from our list.

Agents Wanted.—Every one can thus get a valuable present, dealing with us and depending on having genuine returns, and the article drawn will be forwarded immediately on delivery to return mail or express. Entire satisfaction always in all cases. Six Certificates for $1 thereafter for 25.

What the "Press" say of Us.

GREAT GIFT DISTRIBUTION.—A rare opportunity is offered by obtaining watches, chains, diamond rings, silverware, etc., by Messrs. Arrandale & Co., at No. 167 Broadway, New York, who advertise to sell articles, varying in value, and all are offered for $1 each. The distribution is made on the principle to take a certificate of a certain description, on receiving which you are informed what article it is worth, and if satisfied with the article, send the money, and pay $50 or $100. An extra fine Watch is given away to a dollar-spending customer.—New York Evening Post, Feb. 19, 1865.

Messrs. Arrandale & Co. have now been personally known to us, and we believe them to be every way worthy of public confidence.—New York Scottish American Journal, June 11, 1864.

We have inspected, at the office of Arrandale & Co., Agency for Evergreen Manufacturing Company, a large assortment of fashionable and valuable jewellery of the newest patterns, also of the same quality of 1000 silver-plate, and understand that the whole of these articles are intended to be disposed of on a novel principle, giving great advantages to buyers, and affording extensive employment to agents. We hold the firm in question to be a very respectable and thoroughly reliable one to deal with, and recommend our friends to read their advertisement.—New York Saturday Press, Sept. 3, 1864.

By Messrs. Arrandale & Co.'s arrangement, the advantages must be on the side of the customer, for he has everything to gain, and nothing comparatively to lose. His ticket at worst only pays for his declared hand, and he need not send it if he is not satisfied.—New York Weekly Mercury, Sept. 3, 1864.

EXCITEMENT FOR LADIES.—The most eligible and desirable emporium for watches, and out of sight in the sale of certificates for the "Great Gift Distribution" of Arrandale & Co., a lady of the establishment named the articles, sent as prizes for her agency, to this office for inspection, and we must say, their selection was all such and all of the articles were worth treble the amount of cost to the recipients, and some of them six times.

ARRANDALE & CO., Manufacturers' Agents,
No. 167 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Announce that all the above list of goods will be sold for One Dollar each.

In consequence of the great sensation of trade in the manufacturing establishments of Europe, which for two having cut off the supply of cotton, a large quantity of Jewellery, Watches and Diamonds are now in the market, has been sent off for sale in this country, and WHICH MUST BE SOLD AT ONCE.

Under these circumstances, ARRANDALE & CO. selected as Agents for the sale of these goods, and therefore have received upon a Great Gift Distribution, subject to the following conditions:

CERTIFICATES of the various articles are first put into envelopes, sealed, and well mixed, so that no one can see or can ascertain what is to be drawn, and sent by mail to any address.

On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you are to have, and you have the option to send the money or not, as you please. If you do not, return the Certificate to us, and you will be entitled to any article on the list named for ONE DOLLAR.

Address, We want agents in every regiment, and in every town and county in the country, and those acting as such will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered for them, provided their remittance amounts to One Dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents by every Certificate sold, and remit 15 cents to us, keeping 10 cents for their trouble.

ARRANDALE & CO.,
167 Broadway, New York.

ARCANA WATCH.

An Elegant Novelty in Watches.

The cases of this watch are an entirely new invention, composed of six different metals combined, rolled in solder and plumbed, producing a case of exquisite beauty of 18 carat gold, called Arcana, which will always keep its color. They are as beautiful and durable as solid gold, and are offered at one-eighth the cost. The case is beautifully engraved, with a shield for name, and with Patent Push Pin, and engraved in the most elegant manner. The movements are of the finest quality for durableness and chronometer, and are made by the well-known St. James Watch Company of Geneva, and are superbly finished, having engraved patentes, fancy carved bridges, exquisitely jewelled, with gold balance, and the improved ruby pin jewelled action, with fine dial and skeleton hands, and is warranted a perfect timekeeper. These watches are of three different sizes, the smallest being for ladies, and are all Stem Winders. A case of the watch will be sent by Express for $125. A single one sent in an elegant Morocco case for $135 on receipt of money, or sent C. O. D. We are the sole agents for the watch in the United States, and none are genuine which do not bear the Trade Mark.

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1864, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 497.—Vol. XX.] NEW YORK, APRIL 8, 1865. [PRICE 10 CENTS. $4 00 YEARLY. $2 WEEKS $1 00.

Railway Murders.

THE risk to life and limb, in the trenches before Petersburg, is far less than on our railways. Hardly a day passes without bringing us the shocking details of some wholesale slaughter and maiming, euphemised as "an accident!" Ten or fifteen dead, and fifty or sixty wounded; and yet the next day a packed coroner's jury, made up of persons in the pay or employment of the railway on which the murder has occurred, tells us that there was nobody to blame! A week or two ago, three or four carloads of our brave soldiers, on furlough from the Army of Potomac, hastening home to their familiar hearths, and the sweet society of friends and relatives, their hearts full of hope and bright anticipations, were crushed up by a heavy train, and more of them killed and wounded than fell at Big Bethel or in one-half of the "battles" of the early past of the war. Full a tenth of a complete regiment was slain or disabled. The dead are buried, and the wounded are writhing in hospitals, to return to their homes, if at all, wretched cripples, without the consolation which the soldier feels who suffers on the field of honor in defence of his flag and his country.

The coroner's jury, made up of village Dogberrys, report no one to blame, and that the switchman, who turned the upward thundering train full upon the one standing on the track three hours behind time, must have misunderstood the directions of the conductor! Are directions then given so loosely and carelessly, in matters involving the lives and limbs of hundreds? Railways laugh legal enactments for the protection of passengers to scorn. They enjoy exclusive rights from the public, and yet give to that public no guarantees in return. Once possessed of their privileges, their "chartered rights," they throw aside all sense of responsibility, and if any poor wretch, maimed for life through their carelessness or mismanagement, institutes a suit against them for damages, he must expend all for a lost leg or arm, or perhaps total disablement, they contest his claim with all the resources of wealth and influence. Many a poor victim has been compelled to submit to the most palpable fraud rather than combat their superior power before courts and juries. The grievances of the public, so far as railways are concerned, seem to be beyond legal relief, and the hope seems to be in time of remedying them, except through the code of Judge Lynch. The sentiment of the country would have justified, not to say applauded, the marvelous proceedings, in the late New Jersey "catastrophe," if they had seized on the criminal employees, or on their default, on any of the directors of the railway, and shot them on the spot. Suppose any of the seventy or eighty crippled soldiers should bring a suit for damages against the great swindling railway monopoly of New Jersey, what would be the chances of his recovering a dollar from a New Jersey jury? Small indeed! A monopoly that has corrupted the politics, the judiciary, and the press of a whole State, and shot them, and the sentiment of the entire people of the State, and which sends its representatives into the very Senate of the Nation, will respond to no appeal of justice, nor yield to any of the sympathy it has helped to outrage and contemn all law; it holds itself independent of public opinion, and stands in the path of travel a reckless, irresponsible, monstrous obstruction. The New York Central Railway is but little better, in character, and equally reckless in conduct. While we write the wires come loaded with the details of another shocking massacre—the second within a week.

We see no way of lending a reasonable security to railway travel except through the means of a law making an employer and agent to appal these who direct and manage railways into a sense of their responsibility. A short shrift and a long rope might effect that which legal enactments, the complaints of the public and the appeals of the press have signally failed to secure.

Change in Sentiment Abroad.

The events of the war, and more especially the murders of Gen. Sherman and their consequences, have produced a wonderful change in European sentiment, and are operating in a very marked manner on European policy as regards this country and continent. The public ists of England and France, the while being rather than displeased, have looked upon the civil war in the United States as certain to result in political dismemberment. They have accustomed themselves to con sider the position of the insurrectionary States under the Constitution and laws, or, as they preferred to call it, their "subjugation," as a thing impossible. "Where in history," they asked triumphantly, "is there an instance of twelve millions of people being thus subjugated?" The fact that no nationality was ever fairly reduced or completely subjugated, and wherever repressed always ready to re-assert itself, are translated at Poland at this hour, was torn from its place of significance in history and made to apply to the rebellion, in disregard of the fact that the English civil war profited by the example of the Americans in having aged in it, and in equal disregard of the fact that the insurrection in La Vendée was put down by the sword, and the people, rather than the principles of the French Revolution, were subdued. The hazards and animosities of civil war are seldom perpetuated beyond the generation in which they have arisen.

It may be that the conductors of the disorganizing press, and the men who decide on public affairs in their legislative bodies, have refreshed their memories under the suggestions afforded by the progress of the war, and that, at this late date, they have come to think that the rebellion may be put down, but that the South may be subjugated," and furthermore, that the subjugation pertained to the very good and for evil, not at some distant day, but now, at once, and make the continent to rule under their developed and consolidated power. The Emperor of France, more than any other, not only denied but ridiculed the possibility of Federal success, now confesses its probability, and treats the rebellion as moribund. It accepts the situation, and is ready to enter into amicable relations with the North and South for the redress of mutual grievances, and discusses the possibility of a war between the restored States and Great Britain, declaring from all the circumstances the consoling conclusion that it will not be immediately undertaken, or if so, the parties will be back to the old footing of peace and resources to be successful against a strong and fresh antagonist—as though trained athlete were not the most formidable in the ring.

The change visible in the tone of the leading paper of England has been also adopted by the smaller provincial and colonial newspapers, which are seldom more than echoes of the great organ of the aristocracy. Two quotations will illustrate what we have said. The first is from the London Times itself, which, after adverting to the march of Sherman through Georgia, says:

> "The chances of the North Carolinians being able to resist him successfully are not small. It becomes more and more clear that the Confederacy, with all its real resources, though still energetic in their resistance, are exhausted of the first momentary or war-a supply of men."

The London Herald:

> "The time has come enough to humiliate the proud and obdurate, the weak and selfish. Since Grant established his lines around Petersburg and Lee, the war has ran strongly against the Confederacy. The South is now cut in two, and the capture of Wilmington and Fort Fisher and have sustained several severe reprisals. Lee's army is now in a state of starvation. Sherman is in undisputed possession of Savannah. Of her principal cities the Confederacy has only Richmond and Charleston left. The evacuation of Charleston is a bitter sorrow for the South, and the capture of Richmond will be a still more bitter humiliation. No real cause is now to prove that the City of Richmond can make a successful defense, and that if she would bring the war to a speedy and successful issue she must evacuate her capital, and withdraw. Recent declarations from the North show that the Government is willing to entertain the question of recognition, unaccompanied by submission, involves it yet more certainly."

The London Army and Navy Gazette:

> "The news by the Bina is of a character to tax the faith of those who believe that the Confederacy is not in a desperate case as to its finances. Lee's communications are turned and abandoned. Petersburg is preparing for a flight, and Richmond is the object of a siege. Gen. Thomas's military force on the West—Hood and his Confederates being quite out of the way."

Finally the Montreal Telegraph, the rebel organ in Canada:

> "The prospect for the South does not appear favorable. Her forces are in front of a gigantic contest, waged on both sides with the most deadly energy, while the last and only hope of success—fighting power, while the last of her army, the sufferers of the fighting population is being exhausted by the process of bleeding to death by the ranks and the desertion of her soldiers. The Confederacy is fighting for her existence with the disorganizing element in her midst. Her people are starving, her army is deserting, and her Government is paralyzed and enfeebled. If the Confederate armies are now actually wasting away from disease and desertion, and if the Confederate country power of the Confederacy and terminate the struggle. The existence of the Confederacy and the Confederate army are considered. It is to be seen that if these elements of weakness have been at work to any ultimate ruin.

"And if the dark clouds that now cover the Confederacy light may breakmay prove the dawn of bright r ays, but such a result, however, is may be together, so far as our knowledge goes, is little to be anticipated."

In France we observe the growth of the conviction that the National Government will reassert its authority at no early day over the entire South. The Opinions Nationale, the organ of Prince Napoleon (which, however, has always been friendly to us), observes on the latest advices from the United States:

> "The whole people will hold out in the Carolinas to the last fire to their mountains, will run into the forests, the fastnesses of the cultivated portion of the world, for they have never been subjugated, and never can be subjugated. Such a war of resistance has never been known in history, and such a war of resistance is the only one which, of course, accepted by sherman as well calculated to bring the rebellion to its last struggles. The Federals have established the plans of his enemy by the skill of his tactics and the energy of his movements. Fayetteville is now in the hands of the Federals, and Sherman's forces are pushing on to Raleigh, the capital of North Carolina. Richmond will be the last retreat of Mr. Jefferson Davis, and he will have around him the last rebel cheers will end after."

In the French Senate on the 9th of March the Marquis de Boissy conducted the Revolt of the Southern States, but strongly expressed his wish that the war between the Federals and Confederates might be carried on to the complete ruin of both belligerents, rather than the French army in Mexico should be made prisoners by the conclusion of peace. This expression of the Marquis is said to have been received with general confessions of disapprobation; but it seems to indicate that there exists in France, as well as in England, an apprehension not only of the permanent reestablishment of the Republic in this country, but of a latent feeling and purpose on their part to resent the insults which they have received from abroad, as well as to vindicate the principles professed by their fathers, and which Spain and France have so signally outraged.

A Harrison paper states that three had been imported into the so-called "Confederate States," through the ports of Wilmington and Charleston, from October 1st, 1864, to December 1st of the same year, 8,622,000 pounds of meat, 1,507,000 pounds of lead, 1,033 pounds of saltpetre, 544,000 pairs of shoes, 345,000 pairs of blankets, 320,000 pounds of coffee, 50,000 rifles, 97 packages of revolvers, 2,639 packages of medicine, 43 cannons. The shipments of cotton made by the Rebel Government from March 1, 1864, amounted to 45,226,000 in gold.

A CORRESPONDENT of a petroleum paper in Pittsburg describes the "now and then" of the Yennego petroleum region and its inhabitants. Of the latter he says:

> "Individuals that used to depend upon a few acres of very poor land for their own and a pig's support, are astonished through the winter, living high, mainly, in the enjoyment of luxuries and sensible fare, with a dwelling now in howes-stone and marble, and driving their fine horses, and the like, in fashionable style. Young persons that used to hunt rattlesnakes barefooted, and in tow-linsey and sassafras dry, with much of anything to surround—are wearing broadcloth and kid gloves, and riding in their own carriages about taverns have become proprietors of hotels where they used to get their drudges work done for a pittance and have mansions and maid servants of their own."

From the following table it will be seen that the gold premium on the currency have been as follows, 000,000 in advance of the payments of gold interest since the beginning of the current fiscal year:

Gold Interest Payments.		Gold Premium.

The rebel Congress, before adjourning (when to meet again, and where?), issued an "Address to the Southern People," which is a wonderful combination of bluster and fear. It may be called Shrieky, often pathetic, and there is not a little which may be called pointed and adjurative, as for example:

> "The crown stands ready to encircle the fair brow of our young republic. The shades of our martyred heroes hover over us and point to the glorious destiny before us; our mothers, wives and daughters to weave the immortal wreath. Will you, can you, dare you, refuse? Will you be the weapons, which the God of battles has so often placed in the hands of the despoilers of our homes, now to drop from our nerves and fall, shame and disconsolate, at the supreme crown of the enemy?

> "The hand is the weapon,
> Which the Judge of right and wrong
> Has placed in the hands of the slaves!
> The God of Devils will > Guides the pitiful wretch, and > Drives his glowing yet to sin.
> Wrong shuddered."

The last European steamer tells us that on sabbath last (February 26) a terrific storm of lightning and rain burst upon the streetsof that city, giving the following from the 18th Chapter of the Revelations, apropos of the late Rebel Congress:

> "And the kingdom was smit by Failure!
> Its fallen! for her sins have reached unto Heaven, and God hath remembered her iniquities and the mountains of the earth shall weep and mourn over her, in no city shall any more be found wickedness. The chains are cast off, and silver, and precious stones, and of pearls, and fine linen, and white, and silk, and fine purple and wheat, and beasts, and sheep, and horses, and chariots, and slaves, and souls of men. And every shipmaster, and all the company in ships, and sailors, and as many as trade by sea, from a distance stood afar off, and cried, when they saw the smoke of her burning, saying, "What city is like unto this great city?"

To End, in the column of literary announcements and notices in the Daily Press, of the 18th ult., the following paragraph:

> "American antiquarians are looking forward with interest for a work, announced to be forthcoming from the facile pen of Hon. E. Geo. Squier, embodying the results of his archæological explorations of Peru, which country he lately visited as United States Commissioner for the settlement of disputed claims, under a recent treaty. No treaty, perhaps, was ever better fitted, by personal prejudice, for the investigations of a new and rich field for discovery than Mr. Squier. He knows exactly what to look for and how to appreciate what he finds—his preparation, in the way of artistic help, etc., is one of the most complete that has ever been made. His exploration included most of the sites famous in the early history of the country—the Lake of Titicaca, and its mythical neighbor hood, Cuzco, the ancient capital of the Incas, etc., and the results of his labors will be the records of antiquarian research, calculated to throw a flood of light upon the early history of the aboriginal races of American germ and history. Mr. Squier's acquaintance with Peru, and especially with the ancient remains gathered from personal study by men of great fame, but he is also a practiced archæologist, and a pains-taking and diligence to make authority."

In concluding the preface to his "Life of Cæsar," the British Emperor moves his object in writing the book. He says he attempted to write the life of Cæsar, it is partly for the sake of Charlemagne, the medieval Cæsar; and it is, above all, for the sake of Napoleon, whose name, he considers, stands that the work in question is laid before the world. The aim of the Imperial author is to prove that the three men raised up by God to be the Cæsar, Charlemagne and Napoleon, it is to trace out to nations the path they ought to follow—to stamp a mark on each of the great epochs which they accomplish in a few years the work of many centuries."

Very few persons have any conception of the value of oil lands which have changed ownership during the past few months. It is stated that the records of Venango county, Penn., will show in the aggregate a greater amount of business in the real estate line than is usual for a whole year. Yet notwithstanding this marvellous fact, there has hitherto existed no reliable map of this remarkable country, to show the location of its immense wealth. Most serious difficulties have arisen, and ruinous losses have occurred from this want. Individuals and companies have invested large amounts in property, supposed to be located on or near streams which gave to them their main value, but which, we have now found to be far removed therefrom. In into connection we would state that a map has been shown a work now publishing, for $12 50 per copy, by Messrs. P. W. Ryers & Co., 43 John street, entitled "The Atlas of the Oil Regions," which seems accurately and fully to meet the wants of the whole community. For accuracy and completeness it surpasses any of the kind hitherto produced in the or any other country.

The question of the assumption of the rebel debt in case of the subjugation of the South and the restoration of the Union, has been discussed in several newspapers, as if such a thing were possible. And yet perhaps more than half the rebel debt is owned abroad. The greater part of it is in the hands of Englishmen. We do not believe any of them in their senses can be found enough to go before the American people with a proposition to make good to these foreigners what they have lost by Jeff. Davis's cruel plan in murdering our brothers and destroying the Union. The day for that kind of nonsense has gone by, if it ever existed.

PROF. AGASSIZ has started on a scientific expedition to Brazil, accompanied by a select party, consisting of his wife, Dr. B. E. Cotting—the curator of the Lowell Institute of Boston—and Mr. Cabot, the liberal gentleman who is to be the artist of the expedition, and Messrs. Anthony, Seaver, Hart, St. Johns, Allen and James, as assistants. The party sailed from Boston Harbor, where, after a rest of a few weeks, the members will separate. Prof. Agassiz and his wife, Dr. and Mrs. Cotting, and Mr. Cabot will then proceed to the Amazon, passing along that river in boats to the Andes, and then crossing over to Lima. Here the aforesaid will be joined again in as yet not decided upon. The assistants have each their special department of specimens to collect, and will join Rio Janeiro separate for the purpose of searching for and procuring them.

A BOOK was published in London a few years ago in advocacy of the decimal system. Its proposition was to make everything decimal. The day, now 24 hours, was to be 10 hours; the year was to have 10 months, Umber, Dauber, etc. Fortunately there are ten commandments, or there were to be no relief whatever, no deviation from, the moral law. But the twelve apostles! From rejecting Judas, there is a whole apostate of difficulty.

A "Veteran Observer," in the New York Times, estimates the increase of our able-bodied men since the war began as 320,000, and the increase of taxable property as $4,000,000. He then makes us rebel, estimating the debt at $2,000,000,000, by two and a half billions than we were in 1860.

The Finance Minister of Canada, in a late speech, declared, "The Canadian Confederacy is of opinion that so long as the American war lasts we must have a force on the Frontier, in the shape of a good militia force, to support the civil authorities and fulfil the obligations we are under to act the part of good neighbors towards the United States."

A CORRESPONDENT of the Times, writing from the Shenandoah Valley, tells us that among the papers found at Early's baggage was a letter from Jeff Davis, in reply to a petition of the soldiers to have the war brought to a close, and the fight fought four years and accomplished. Nothing. Davis's reply was characteristic. He simply expresses the hope that it does not represent the feelings of a majority of his army.

SEC. WELLES, Assistant Sec. Fox and Major-Gen. Robert Anderson will visit Charleston for the purpose of raising the old flag on Fort Sumter, which was taken away with General, then Major,

Anderson, on his departure for New York. The flag has been sacredly preserved, and will again be thrown to the breeze on old Sumter's walls on the 12th of April, the anniversary of the capture of the fort by the rebels.

Summary of the War.

NORTH CAROLINA.

According to rebel accounts there had been an engagement between the rebels and our troops at Averysboro, and another between the two opposing armies at Bentonsville. As the rebels retreated into Raleigh, the advantage must have been with the Union forces. It was, most probably, nothing more than an affair between our advance and their rear guard, but as drowning men grasp at straws, so the Richmond papers have trumpeted these trifling encounters as victories.

A brisk engagement on last Tuesday, the 21st inst., near Mount Olive, N. C., between a portion of Gen. Sherman's army and the rebels, in which the latter were flanked and overpowered, is announced in a dispatch from Newberne. The rebels retreated in confusion towards Raleigh, and Gen. Sherman's troops pushed on after them, reaching and taking possession, it is said, of Smithfield, on the railroad from Goldsboro to Raleigh, half way between the two towns. Goldsboro was occupied by Gen. Schofield's forces on the same day, and in his dispatch stated that he had heard from Gen. Sherman's right wing in the vicinity of Mount Olive, and that firing had been heard in that direction on that day. This was no doubt from the engagement now reported from Newberne. Gens. Sherman, Schofield and Terry were within hourly communication at the date of latest accounts, and were co-operating in a vigorous pressure on Gen. Johnston's rebel forces, sweeping all before them. It was considered certain that Raleigh would soon succumb to them, which it has probably done by this time.

VIRGINIA.

Before daylight on Saturday morning, the 25th of March, three divisions of the enemy made a sudden and determined attack on Fort Steadman, in front of Petersburg, overpowering the garrison and capturing the fort, where they temporarily established themselves, and turned the guns upon our lines. Our troops on either flank maintained their ground. A determined attack on Fort Haskell was gallantly repulsed with great loss to the enemy. After several attempts to retake the hill, a charge was made by the 2d brigade, aided by the troops of the 3d division on either flank, and the rebels were driven out of the fort, with the loss of about 2,700 prisoners, and the whole line was re-occupied, with the guns uninjured. The slaughter of the enemy at the point where they entered our lines, and in front of it, is estimated by Gen. Grant at not less than 3,000. Our own loss is estimated at 800, and may prove to be less.

ALABAMA.

A New Orleans dispatch of the 18th inst. states that the movement of Gen. Canby's troops against Mobile commenced on the day previous. Portions of both the 13th and 23d corps were in motion, and two brigades had started in the direction of Bon Secours, on the eastern side of Mobile bay. As auxiliary to the operations, two brigades of national troops, under Gen. Andrews, had moved from Barrancas and occupied Pensacola, Fla.

TOWN GOSSIP.

The tremendous header taken by gold within the past week or so has perplexed the business folks, but the common people, although the necessaries of their lives are little cheaper, are sure in their hearts that this is a move in the right direction, and are confident they are beginning to feel better. United States bonds are still in great demand in Germany, a stimulus having been given them by the fall of Charleston; they ruled in Frankfort, by the last advices, at 54½, something over New York prices of the date. A momentous indication is the prediction in the London Times, that the capture of cotton at Savannah will exercise a distinct effect upon the exchange with England, even to the extent of reversing the tide of gold, and sweeping it into this country again.

Now we look upon gold with an eye of the deepest respect and affection; we have but little cotton personally to be dispose of; the trifle that we could spare exists as a manufactured article in the form of some cheap socks that were a failure, and are now lying exploded in a drawer; whether there is actually any more of the commodity about the place we do not know; it is a secret that lies hidden in the bosom of Mrs. We. Still we are sure that that immigration of gold is to tend somehow to our personal advantage. We gloat over it as if it was to be our own. We imitate the very appropriate behavior of Mr. Bumble the beadle, in "Oliver Twist," when he anticipated coming into the housekeeper's tea-things; and placing the gleaming bullion before our eyes on a table of the mind, we cock our official hat sideways and execute a circular solo dance, as a cross between a religious rite and an expression of private satisfaction. Now Mr. Bumble in the story got the tea-things, but he never got the satisfaction; and our business-editor has been trying to convince us that a sudden plethora and fall of gold would be an immense disadvantage in the mercantile community; we never could argue; so we merely said that it was just the disadvantage we had long unselfishly desired to labor under, and then concealed ourself from human observation in the pages of a newspaper that lay at hand.

We happened to light on the published exculpation of Vice-President Johnson.

One of the first efforts of the transparent cunning which is so engaging in childhood is the getting off an apology through the lips of a proxy. "Mick, you go up to master," says Mike, "and tell him you seen Mac make the marks in my primer." When a noble functionary, busy in tossing down glass on glass of amiable weakness in what he considers the sanctity of his closet, comes to see that the door is wide open, and that a whole nation is looking at him with abhorrence in its eyes, his best plan is to look up some friend who may go about saying that the weakness was probably whey-and-water. At such a moment, however, one's friends have an ugly way of being nowhere. One is lucky if he can discover so amiable and estimable a gentleman as Mr. Hackett, better known as Falstaff Hackett, willing to lay his huge hill of flesh between him and the merciless gibes of the public. To be sure, it is rather manlier to get up oneself, and say: "Fellow-citizens, having now proved my favorite assertion that I am a plebeian, I respectfully beg leave to retire." But a man just after debauch feels that he is not then even the ninth part of a man, and that it is no moment for manliness. So he causes to be published the well-meant letter of his friend, trusting that the skilful hand which formerly elicited Shakespearean criticisms from Mr. Lincoln, will now be able to extract the tear of sentiment from a mocking public, and cowers miserably in his thorny seat of state till he shall learn the result.

The result is instantaneous and final—a very full discussion of Mr. Hackett's good taste, and nothing more.

A man in Nassau street reports that he will shortly issue an American edition of the "Vie de César." What a grand purchase is given for elevating the public, when you have a throne for a fulcrum. Everybody must have an opinion of the last romance by the Great Known. A couple of years since, Mr. Kinglake thought he made a hit by pointing to Louis Napoleon in his robes, and saying quietly, "a literary man." Napoleon, they say, heard these words and the rest of the vituperation, and merely said, grandly: "C'est ignoble." Now he shifts the repartee by accepting the situation in all its perils—and writing a book; a book for his courtiers to kiss, for Victor Hugo to scorch up, for the German critics to analyse in the coldest blood, for the English critics to rend with clumsy hate, and for true-born Americans to read with mournful disapproval.

For the book will be one long defence of autocracy. The spirit in which it is composed reveals itself to us in the preface, which, as an avant courrier, flies before. Hero worship is represented as the proper attitude of the public mind, and the hero is the man who proves himself strong enough to control it. That Napoleon is a genius, few are silly enough to deny; and it is a real misfortune when genius lends its force to an important and elaborate defence of an exploded idea. The control of a strong mind is certainly far better than anarchy, but no theory is more mischievous than the imperial author's implied one, that ability is its own excuse for tyrannizing. His heroes, Charlemagne, Cæsar and Napoleon were certainly not without their measure of pagan grandeur; but Washington, who is not in the royal biographer's mind at all, understood a truer greatness when he lived and ruled and died for his noble doctrine of the equal chance to all.

Meantime the air is sweet with rumors of peace, and it seems as if these fine rude winds of March, that are blowing the violets awake, were bursting with news of the good time coming. We know that the winds of another March will sweep over the length and breadth of a re-united and hopeful land, and that nature in her kindly way will already then have begun to cover with springing flowers the soldier's grave, the ruined fort, and even, as soon as it shall have settled, that fluctuating and evasive indentation, the last ditch.

The city, which has listened for a century of evenings to the magical impersonation of "Hamlet" by Edwin Booth, was reluctantly compelled to forego the entertainment, which had become a luxurious habit, in order to make way for a previous business engagement. "Hamlet" was withdrawn at the very summit of its pecuniary and popular success; as the actor showed no sign of weariness and monotony in his play, so the people were eager to show that they could never tire. On the concluding representation the attendance took the air of an ovation; the house was very large, and after calling the tragedian many times before the curtain, the audience presented him finally with a laurel, which he denied them the pleasure of seeing upon his Shakespearean forehead. A few rapid words of thanks, and one of Mr. Booth's modest bows, and the inky cloak of Hamlet finally left the stage; we fear it will be long before it falls on Mr. Booth's equal, but hope it will for many years continue to embrace its present wearer in its statuesque folds. The present entertainment at the Winter Garden is a spirited military drama from the clever pen of Mr. Fisk, called "Corporal Cartouche," with Mr. Placide in the title part.

At Wallack's there is a rapid succession of comedies and the melodrama, supported by the efficient stock company.

Mr. Wheatley has effected an engagement with Lucille Western, the popular sensation actress, whose performance in "East Lynne" is so constantly applauded. We have not seen her.

"The Streets of New York," though of a goodly length, were never known to be so nearly interminable as they have proved on the stage of the Olympic. At last they show some signs of giving the wall to other attractions, and the actors are taking their leave in a succession of benefits.

We hear fabulous stories of the beauty and accomplishments of Mrs. Edward Smith, a lady elocutionist, whose entertainment, elocutional, instrumental and vocal, is to come off at Dodworth's on the 5th of April.

Miss Stella Bonheur, a young vocalist of great promise, will be tendered a complimentary concert at Irving Hall, on the evening of April 15th, under the patronage of some of our very best citizens.

Gottschalk is come again, and thrice as fair! Ah, what a charm rests in that swift white hand! "Let us put on our bonnets and go," as Julie Dodd advises the gentlemen, for Gottschalk has cruelly determined to leave us for foreign parts, and these are our last chances, we fear, for many and many a long month, of laying our ears to those delicious sounds.

NEW BOOKS, &c.

Messrs. Ticknor and Fields have recently issued two books of an unusually interesting character. The "Cape Cod," of H. D. Thoreau, a wonderful bit of prerapheelite study from nature; and Emerson's original and suggestive "Poems," bound in blue and gold, with a lifelike portrait of the Concord philosopher.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—A gentleman named Burr has been fined $20 for calling another gentleman, named Atkins, a copperhead and a traitor.

— A letter from Beaufort, dated 19th March, says the wharves along Cape Fear river, from Wilmington to Fayetteville, are literally piled with captured cotton, turpentine, pitch and rosin, awaiting transportation to the seacoast. The value of this captured property is estimated at millions.

— Not long since a married couple, in Farmington, Van Buren county, Iowa, early one morning, found a cow and a calf in their lot; the cow had a collar on with a note attached, requesting that she should be taken care of till called for. Some nights afterwards a basket was found at their door containing an infant, about a week old, and a note saying the baby was the owner of the cow!

— The Philadelphia coal-dealers are delivering coal to consumers in square iron boxes, holding 75 pounds, which are emptied into the cellars without dirt or confusion.

— The maple sugar crop in Vermont last year was worth $2,250,000, and the farmers are determined to make it worth a good deal more this year.

— A Nevada paper describes a curious scene in a theatre in Virginia City, in February, where the performances of two actresses were so well liked that the audience rattled down upon the stage a shower of gold and silver pieces. The actresses picked up $147 from the boards. Even the male performers were not slighted. They picked up halves and quarters to the amount of from $3 to $5 each, to say nothing of jack-knives, pocketcombs and toothpicks. The young ladies were so often forced to return to gather the silver showers that they appeared several times on the point of giving it up. One of them, having finished gathering a bountiful harvest of halves, was making a hasty retreat from the stage, when there suddenly fell about her such a glittering and overwhelming shower of silver that in despair she sat down and covered her face with her hands. The pockets of another gave out, and a torrent of silver rolled about the floor in every direction. All this was, of course, fun for the audience, though the young ladies found it quite as profitable as funny.

— If the expectations of Kentucky's six or seven hundred oil companies are just, the State must be fuller of oil than ever a sperm whale was. At any rate, the companies mean to try her, says the Louisville Journal.

— There have been more than 50 serious railway accidents in the country since the year opened. In the last week of February there were 10, and since the 1st of January more than 60 people have been killed, and nearly 500 wounded.

— Speaking of the antiquity of the topic, "the weather," and the remoteness of time when people wrote about it, the Picayune says: "When the dove, the original news carrier, fetched into the ark the first number of the Ararat Olive Branch, the very first item of news upon which the eye of Noah fell was a weather paragraph, notifying him and his family that the 40 days' storm was over, and that they could once more venture out of doors."

— In 1626, Manhattan Island was bought by Hendrik Hudson for $24.

— All the cotton captured in Savannah is now on shipboard, and it amounts to 38,076 bales—several thousands more than the highest estimates when Savannah fell into the hands of Gen. Sherman.

— The mania for collecting relics at Charleston and sending them North seems to be on the increase. Wendell Phillips has the bell once attached to the slave market, and Gen. Butler the doorplate of Mr. Richard Yeadon, who, it will be remembered, once offered $10,000 for the General's head.

— Several of our exchanges state that butter, for which 50 cents was refused, has been sold at Montpelier, Vt., for 25 cents per pound, and that the prospect is that the price will be still lower.

— There are now 913 National Banks in the country. Many State institutions are constantly making applications to be included among the number.

— The army and navy are opening subscriptions in Charleston for the benefit of the sufferers by the fire in Columbia. Among the contributions acknowledged is one of $143 from the officers and crew of the monitor Catskill.

Southern.—Ex-Gov. Aiken, of South Carolina, one of the wealthiest and few loyal men of the State, has recently presented each of his 750 slaves with their freedom and a farm.

— Rebel refugees are arriving in Philadelphia so rapidly at present that a public meeting has been called to provide for them.

— At a recent meeting held by the citizens of Wilmington the Rev. Mr. Hepburn said: "The Confederacy was founded on the principle of State rights; and the rights of the States were at the very first trampled under foot. Then we had a conscript law; it was denounced by some of the leading men of our States as unconstitutional, and as what ought never to be in a free country; but the law was passed, as sweeping, ruthless and cruel a system of conscription as ever disgraced the legislation of any country. Every year added to its injustice and severity, until at last Mr. Davis demanded all exemptions should be revoked, and that in his hands should be lodged the whole power of deciding whether a man should serve the Confederacy at home or in the field. He was to detail men to practise medicine, preach the Gospel, edit newspapers, make laws, etc. What a claim was that to be put forth in this once free country! Then we had most oppressive taxes—'the last doit wrung from the clutched hand of poverty'—and owing to some mysterious blunder or fraud, that tax must be doubled. Had we remained much longer in their power, there are many here who would have had to sell everything to pay their taxes. I need not dwell on the repudiation of the currency, the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, the legalized robbery called impressment, the want of good faith in their dealings with our citizens, the secret sessions of Congress, etc., etc. To close the catalogue of their follies and crimes, we see that slavery, which was declared by Mr. Stephens the corner-stone of the Confederacy, will soon be completely destroyed by them. I say, then, what claims has a Government, which has thus forsaken all the principles upon which it was founded, and which has been guilty of so prolonged and systematic injustice and oppression, upon any man for confidence and support? Truly do these resolutions declare that the war is now waged for the sake of a Government which has forfeited all claims to our confidence and affection."

— One of the committee of citizens of Charleston, charged with the distribution of the rice, asked that an order should be issued requiring the colored people to meet at specified places on one day and the whites on the day succeeding. Col. Woolford replied: "Sir, when a man approaches me with the shield of loyalty before him, he seems so bright that I cannot see that he is black; and when he comes with the shield of disloyalty, he looks so black that I cannot see that he is white!" He went on to say that he did not intend to use the words white or black in any official order.

— The Louisville (Ky.) Journal, heretofore committed to the "Border State policy" as regards slavery, now takes up a new and more advanced position. It says: "Now that the Southern Congress has voted to put 200,000 slaves in their army, and Mr. Hunter, the ablest rebel Senator, when voting for the measure under instructions from the Virginia Legislature, has declared that slavery and the Confederacy were ruined, let no man here be afraid to declare and to vote that the time has come to end for ever the slavery agitation in this Government, and to accept, at the earliest possible moment, that new system of labor and industry to which we all know and admit we must come at last."

— The following from a correspondent of the New York Evening Post, at Columbia, S. C., while Sherman was there, adds another to the interesting chain of incidents, which prove that the negroes fully appreciate the issues involved in the movements of the national army: "The skirmishers who had first entered Columbia gathered in groups and lustily cheered their much-loved chief, the chorus was taken up by the negroes who lined the sidewalk and followed the column, and the stranger looker-on would have believed that this was the triumphal return to his house of some favorite hero, rather than the conqueror who had struck another blow at the heart of a people who hate him and his with the hatred of incarnate devils. The negroes shouted and danced along the way, clapping their hands with exclamations of unbounded joy. 'Tank de Almighty God, Mr. Sherman has come at last. We knew it, we prayed for de day, and de Lord Jesus heard our prayers. Mr. Sherman has come wid his company.' One fat old woman said to him, while shaking him by the hand, which he always gladly gives to these poor people: 'I prayed dis long time for yer, and de blessing ob de Lord is on yer. But yesterday afternoon, when yer stopped trowing de shells into de town, and de soldiers run away from de hill ober dar, I tout dat General Burygar had driven you away, for dey said so; but here yer am dun gone. Bress de Lord, yer will hab a place in heaben; yer will go dar, sure.'" Military.—Thirteen of Gen. Sheridan's men, with 17 rebel flags, appeared at the War Department, March 21st, and were welcomed and thanked in the name of the President and people of the United States. The flags were captured during Gen. Sheridan's recent raid.

— The State authorities of North Carolina are reported as having repeatedly remonstrated with the Richmond Government on its inhuman treatment of prisoners of war.

— The President has ordered that on the 13th of April, the fourth anniversary of the fall of Sumter, Major-Gen. Anderson shall raise the national emblem on that fortification.

— The Provost-Marshals in this city inform us that the draft may at any moment be renewed should there be a falling off in recruiting.

— No more passes are issued to civilians to visit the Army of the Potomac, but surgeons and hospital stores are being forwarded in abundance.

— It was stated in debate in the North Carolina Legislature a few weeks since, that the entire effective force of the Confederacy comprised only 121,000 men.

— Gen. Thomas in his report of operations from Sept. 7, 1864, to Jan. 20, 1865, states that 13,189 prisoners were captured from the enemy and 72 pieces of serviceable artillery, and over 2,000 deserters received. Our own loss did not succeed 10,000 in all during the same period.

Naval.—The Navy Department has intelligence of the result of the expedition to St. Marks, Florida. The vessels could not reach the forts, and the troops did not prosecute their proposed march inland. As we have now possession of the mouth of the river, however, the object of the expedition may be said to have been gained.

Personal.—Gen. Shields, who has been for some months at Sinaloa, was arrested at Mazatlan recently by the French authorities, as a spy or suspicious personage, but by the intercession of Mr. Barrow, of Tepic, who visited Mazatlan for the purpose, he was liberated.

— Before Vice-President Johnson left his home for Washington, the colored people of Nashville waited upon him at his home, and in behalf of themselves and friends, presented him with a fine gold watch worth $350, for "his untiring energy in the cause of freedom."

— The Evening Post says that Clarke Mills, the author of those wonderful bronzes that beautify Washington, who in 1861 proposed to the Governor of South Carolina to make cannon to fight the United States with, is now in Washington, occupying a room in the Capitol for a studio, and engaged on the bust of a Massachusetts General.

— R. M. T. Hunter, late President of the rebel Senate, publishes a card in the Richmond papers, declaring his opposition to "a reconstruction of the old Union."

— M. de Montholon, now Minister to Mexico, and so well known in New York as Consul for France to this city, has been appointed French Minister at Washington.

Obituary.—George Constantine Collins, an eminent lawyer of Philadelphia, died in that city on the 21st of March.

— Augustus Henry Fiske, a popular lawyer of Boston, died there on the 21st of March.

— The Duke de Morny, half-brother to Louis Napoleon, and the illegitimate son of Queen Hortense and one of her chamberlains, died in Paris on the 10th of March, aged 51. He was a man of singular and varied endowments, and was undoubtedly more trusted by the Emperor than any of his counsellors. He has died immensely wealthy. In him the Southern rebels have lost their most influential friend.

— On Sunday morning, the 19th of March, at his house in Brooklyn, died John McLenan, one of our most prominent artists. He was a native of Cincinnati, and came to New York, the metropolis of American literature, in 1851, where he became connected with the Lantern, and where he made some of his earliest sketches. Since then he has illustrated books, papers, etc. His last designs were for Frank Leslie's Budget of Fun, to which and Leslie's Lady's Magazine he frequently contributed. He was remarkable for a racy style and artistic power. The most finished of his sketches are his illustrations to Collins's "Woman in White," and "No Name." His merit as a man may be summed up in a sentence—he was never known to have a quarrel or an enemy, and was what he looked, a frank, fearless, kind-hearted man. He leaves a wife and three children totally unprovided for. He was in his 40th year.

Accidents and Offences.—On Monday, some adroit thief, in a mysterious manner, abstracted $69,000 worth of bonds from the private office of the National Bank at the corner of Broadway and Pearl. A reward of $10,000 was offered, and the bonds were as mysteriously recovered, having been found secreted in a house at the upper end of the city.

— A fire broke out in the mixing-room of the Hazard Powder Company's mills near Hazardville, Conn., on the 20th inst., which speedily communicated to an adjacent storehouse in which were about two tons of powder of a wrong size. A fearful explosion resulted, but fortunately no lives were lost, the employés having had time to escape.

— Two men named E. W. Pratt and R. Green, just arrived at this port from Nassau, were arrested on the 17th, on the charge of being officers of the rebel steamer that furnished the French ram Stonewall with her armament. It is not yet known what disposition will be made of them.

— A wagon loaded with powder, belonging to the Barre Powder Mills, while passing through Wilbraham, Mass., on the 20th of March, was blown up, the teamster and horses being instantly killed.

Art, Science and Literature.—The importance of writing rapidly a plain hand is too well appreciated to need any advocacy. One of the very best we have seen is the Babbittonian self-teaching penmanship, which requires no master, but merely a proper attention to the rules. All who wish to improve their caligraphy should devote an hour to the inspection of the Babbittonian system.

— The Indian Telegraph is in working order between Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay, and London. Messages are now being constantly received between England and her Indian possessions in the course of a day or 36 hours. The great delay is on the land. The submarine cable is working splendidly.

Foreign.—Palmerston recently said that the real cause of the present state of Ireland was want of capital—in other words, the poverty of her inhabitants.

— Maximilian, on the 26th ult., published a decree for the protection of the Roman Catholic religion as a State institution; other religions are freely tolerated if they do not contravene morality, civilization and good habits. The establishment of a new religion will, however, require the authorization of the Government. The Council of State shall be informed of any abuses committed by the local authorities against the exercise of other religions, and against the liberties which the laws guarantee to their ministers.

— Among the prisoners taken at Oaxaca were several deserters from the French army. It was said that, in consequence of the fall of Oaxaca, the Juarist Generals, Echeagaray and Jules Garcia, have both given in their submission to the Empire. A treaty with Guatemala is published at Vera Cruz. A Special Inspector of Finances has come from France to arrange accounts with Mexico. The French steam war frigate Rhin and several other French vessels have been lost in a storm off Mazatlan.

— The Imperial Government in Mexico is hostile to the United States Government, it having imprisoned a man, named Valders, for speaking favorably of the Northern cause and predicting the speedy fall of the rebellion. It has also ordered the U. S. Consul at Matamoras to strike his flag and return to Washington.

— The winter in Europe has been very severe—in Scotland there had been no weather so cold for 30 years.

— Lord Palmerston said that England disapproved of the "principles" on which the war on the Plate river was conductor, but she would not interfere if British interests were respected. Portugal was seeking to re-establish friendly relations between England and Brazil.

— An English naval officer, accused of having aided the privateer Rappahannock, was placed on half pay, as "unworthy of the Queen's confidence" in active service.

— The rebel privateer Shenandoah had reached Melbourne, Australia; she reported having burned 11 ships during her voyage from the Cape of Good Hope.

— The Opinion Nationale of Paris (Prince Napoleon's organ) eulogizes Gen. Sherman's operations and tactics in the highest terms, and accuses the rebels of having fired Charleston. It adds: "They have never been anything but rebels against a just Government," having for their watchword "slaves and slavery."

THE CAVE OF EIGG.

ONE of Mr. Hugh Miller's posthumous works contains a graphic description of the Hebridean Islands. Amongst other remarkable spots, Mr. Miller visited and explored the cave in Eigg, where the inhabitants were all smoked to death by the M'Leods of Skye. The terrible tragedy is related by Sir Walter Scott, in the "Tales of a Grandfather." The M'Leods, after scouring the island, had failed to discover any inhabitants, and were on the point of re-embarking, when a solitary man was seen on the hills. He was traced by his footprints, on newly fallen snow, to the cave, which was the hiding-place of the M'Donalds. Mr. Miller says:

"We struck a light, and worming ourselves through the narrow entrance, gained the interior—a true rock gallery—vastly more roomy and lofty than one could have anticipated from the mean vestibule placed in front of it. Its extreme length we found to be 200 feet; its extreme breadth 27 feet; its height where the roof rises highest, from 18 to 20 feet. Never yet was tragedy enacted on a gloomier theatre. An uncertain twilight glimmers grey at the entrance, from the narrow vestibule; but all within, for full 200 feet, is black as with Egyptian darkness. As we passed onward with our one light along the dark mouldering walls and roof which absorbed every straggling ray that reached them, and over the dingy floor sopsy and damp, the place called to recollection that hall in Roman story, hung and carpeted with black, into which Domitian once shut his senate in a frolic, to read their names on the coffin-like placed against the wall. The darkness seemed to press upon us from every side, as if it were a dense jetty fluid, out of which our light had scooped a pallid or two, and that was rushing in to supply the void; and the only objects we saw distinctly visible were each other's heads and faces, and the lighter parts of our dress. The floor, for about the feet length from the narrow vestibule, resembled that of a charnel-house. At almost every step we came upon heaps of human bones, gleaming together, as the latter are graphically described, as when one cuts teth and clave th wood upon the earth.

"They are of a brownish, earthy hue, here and there tinged with green: the skulls, with the exception of a few broken fragments, have disappeared—for travelers in the Hebrides have of late years been numerous and curious—and many a museum, that at Abbotsford among the rest, exhibits, in a grinning skull, its memorial of the massacre at Eigg. We find, too, further marks of visitors in the single bones separated from the heaps and scattered over the area; but enough still remains to show, in the general disposition of the remains, that the hapless islanders died under the walls in families, each little group separated by a few feet from the other. Here and there the remains of the detached skeleton may be seen, as if some robust islander, restless in his agony, he crawled out into the middle space ere he fell; but the social arrangement is the general one. And beneath every bone we find, at the depth, as has been said, of a few inches, the fine dust and straw bed upon which the fiercely bad men reposed with the smaller bones of the human frame, ribs and vertebræ, and hand and foot bones; occasionally, too, with fragments of unglazed pottery, and various other implements of a rude household economy. The minister found for me under one family heap the pieces of a half-burned, unglazed earthen jar, with a narrow mouth, that like the sepulchral urns of our ancient tumuli, had been moulded by the hand without the assistance of the potter's wheel; and to one of the fragments there stuck a minute pellet of gray hair. From under another heap he disinterred the handle-stave of a child's wooden porringer (licker), perforated by a hole still bearing the mark of the cord that had hung it by the wall; and beside the stave lay a few of the larger and less destructible bones of the child, with what for a time puzzled us both, not a little—one of the grinders of a horse. Certain it was, no horse could have got there to have dropped a tooth; a foal of a week old could not have pressed itself through the opening, and how the single grinder, evidently no recent introduction into the cave, could have got mixed up in the same with human bones seemed an enigma somewhat of the class to which the reel in the bottle belongs. I found in Edinburgh an unexpected commentator on the mystery, in the person of my little boy, an experimental philosopher in his second year. I had spread out on the floor the curiosities of Eigg, among the rest the relics of the cave, including the pieces of earthen jar and the fragment of the porringer, but the horse's tooth seemed to be the only real curiosity among them in the eyes of little Bill. He laid instant hold of it, and appropriating it as a toy, continued playing with it, till he fell asleep. I had now little doubt that it was first brought into the cave by the poor child amid whose mouldering remains Mr. Swanson found it. The little pellet of gray hair spoke a feeble old age involved in the wholesale massacre with the vigorous manhood of the island; and here was a story of unsuspecting innocence amusing itself on the eve of destruction with its toys."

ORANGEBURG COURTHOUSE, S. C.—SKETCHED FEB. 13 BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

"AXE-GRINDING" is a term borrowed from one of the stories told by Benjamin Franklin. A little boy going to school was accosted by a man carrying an axe. The man calls the boy all kinds of pretty and endearing names, and induces him to enter a yard where there is a grindstone. "Now, my pretty little fellow," says he with the axe, "only turn that handle and you'll see something very pretty." The boy turns and turns, and the man holds the axe to the stone and pours water over it until the axe is ground. Straightaway he turns with strident voice and fierce gesture on the boy: "You abandoned little miscreant," he cries, "what do you mean by playing truant from school? You deserve a good thrashing. Get you gone, this instant!" "And after this," adds Franklin, "when any one flatters me I always think he has an axe to grind."

THE OLIVE BRANCH AND THE SWORD.

BY MARK VALE.

I.

Pure was the Temple, pure and good,
From cobid base to tapering spire,
Within a sacred altar sloed,
And on it burned a sacred fire.

II.

Alone it stood, in awful night,
And solemn grandeur, stern and still—
An Ark of Refuge for the Right,
The Temple of the People's Will.

III.

Green fields around it stretched afar
Beneath a sky for ever bright,
With lustre shed from Freedom's star,
To bless the day and cheer the night.

IV.

And many a home those fields within
Arose, and many a house of prayer,
And all was peace, save when the din
Of busy labor smote the air.

V.

But ever in the rose's heart
There lurks the secret of decay;
And Nature owns a vile part,
Prone to deceive and to betray.

VI.

Thus treason, vilest spawn of time,
Corrupts the good and blights the fair,
And curses oft the happiest clime
With discord, anguish and despair.

VII.

So did it in the happy land
Wherein the sacred Temple rose,
Opposing many a friendly hand,
And making even brethren foes.

VIII.

So did it, to its damning shame,
This monstrous birth of serpent hate,
With fire and sword the traitors came,
And thundered at the Temple gate.

IX.

Then rose the champion of the truth—
Patriot—to face the rebel horde;
Girt on his own immortal youth,
And answered back with fire and sword.

X.

Till, scattered wide, on every hand,
The hosts of treason shrunk away,
Or helpless, in a blighted land,
In sullen fury stood at bay.

XI.

But still burned on the quenchless fire
Where Freedom's children knelt to pray,
While from the Temple's lofty spire
There went a voice, which seemed to say:

XII.

"O brethren, set the truth you learn,
Accept the holy branch of Peace,
Back to your country's altar turn,
And let this dreadful carnage cease!"

BROTHER AND SISTER.

The Lover's Decision.

BY LUCY A. RANDALL.

AMY THORPE was one of the prettiest little matrons that ever wore a white muslin apron, with pockets ruffled round with cherry ribbon, and carried a business-like bunch of housekeeping keys depending from her trim little waist. Yet she was not so very young; twenty-two summers had left their blue light in her bright eyes, and thrown the shadow of their June roses on her velvet cheek, and she liked to put on small matronly airs, and even hinted obscurely at the propriety of wearing caps. But for all that, when you saw her with her baby in her lap, you couldn't help thinking of a pretty child with its first wax doll!

The pink chintz curtains of her morning-room were scarcely rosier than her cheeks, as she sat there in the golden daylight of the May sunshine, stitching industriously at an infinitesimal bit of cambric ruffling, with the "doll" asleep in a dainty rosewood cradle at her side. It was a very pretty room, with a carpet that looked like brown forest mosses, and windows full of scarlet verbenas and fragrant-leaved geraniums, while the gilded cupids that held up the clock on the mantel were half-hidden in vases of freshly cut roses and sweet English violets. And the open piano, and the half-read books, and the workbasket on the table—what a homelike look they all gave that snug morning-room where little Mrs. Amy idled and played with her baby, and made believe to be portentously industrious with such ostentatious grace that you were deceived in spite of yourself.

Just opposite, with the white shawl drooping off one shoulder, and her gloved hand resting lightly on the piano, stood a tall, slender girl of seventeen, with shy brown eyes half veiled with their pearly lids, pale brown braids of hair, and a complexion pink and white, like freshly opened apple blossoms.

"Don't run away yet, Ettie!" said AMY, coaxfairly, as her guest turned towards the door, and began to arrange the soft folds of the truant shawl.

"I must go," said Ettie Vere. "I only came in for half a minute, on my way down town to see the baby, and kiss the baby's mamma."

"He's as well as possible," said Amy, looking complacently at the tiny inhabitant of the cradle, whose sturdy face against the pillow looked like a magnificent rosebud, "and I do believe he's the prettiest baby that ever lived!"

Miss Vere, only pausing to press her lips to the cerulean cheek of the dimpled little slumberer, disappeared at one door just as Charles Thorpe, proprietor of both mamma and baby, entered at the other, in company with a straight, handsome young fellow, curly-haired and hazel-eyed, whose strong resemblance to Mrs. Amy Halchford at once struck the wash her brother.

"Dick, you're just too late, you lazy fellow," said Miss Thorpe, her bright eyes dancing with mischief. "Ettie Vere has this minute walked out of the room—think of that. You didn't think and I took you 'painfully conscious,' for it's entirely useless."

"Dick is finishing—I'm quite another secret," interposed the husband of the latter, a little maliciously. "He has come in this morning to tell you that his mind is effectually made up on the subject of matrimony."

Amy jumped up and stood on tiptoe to kiss her brother, while her eyes beamed bright congratulations.

"Oh, Dick, I'm so glad!" she chirped, dancing on and down on the toes of the tiniest pair of boots imaginable. "I could kiss you for making such a dear little wife to take care of you, and—"

"My dear, my dear, how often have I warned you against that impulsive habit you have of taking everything for granted," said Charles Thorpe, raising his finger impressively. "Just hear me out, if you please. He is determined to propose to—"

"Well, I knew it—you told me so!" interrupted Amy. "It will be so nice—and I know the sweetest wedding present!"

"Not a bit, Amy," said her husband, whose wet blanket of practical common sense too often extinguished the sparkling fires of his wife's enthusiasm. "He proposes, I was about to say, to Miss Clara Denton."

"Clara Denton!" ejaculated Amy, the dimples vanishing from her cheek, and leaving only blank amazement, "Clara Denton—a mere ball-room coquette!"

"Amy," said Richard Fairlie, with grave, calm dignity, "remember that you are speaking of the lady who is to be my wife—always supposing that she shall see fit to say yes as to accepting me."

Amy sat down, biting her cherry lip, and wishing very hard to keep back the tears that glittered under her long lashes.

"Forgive me, Richard," she said, with a trembling voice, "I only meant—"

"Don't look so vexed, Dick," said the little woman, with sudden penitence. "What can't be cured must be endured—and if you are determined to propose to her, why I suppose I must try my best to be a good little sister-in-law."

"Thank you, darling," said Richard, caressing her dimpled chin with his manly hand. "And now I must go upstairs to my cigar, since you won't allow smoking in this boudoir of yours."

Whereupon the elder of the blood behind Richard Fairlie, Amy exclaimed sagely:

"Charles, do you think he's really in earnest?"

"I am afraid so," said Thorpe, with a slight sadness. "And what is more, I am afraid he will discover his mistake too late. She has contrived to wind all its tentacles him completely."

"The maneuvering, heartless coquette!" ejaculated Amy, setting her teeth energetically together, as if half to smother a sweet and good as Ettie Vere. And, Charles?"

"Well."

"Shall I tell you a great secret I've discovered?"

"Yes."

"I don't believe she cares half so much about him as Ettie does."

"Has Ettie said anything?"

"Not a word," said Amy, indignantly. "Do you suppose a woman talks of such things? No—she confides to our bosoms her thoughts, but she can't tell them in words. I've been in love myself, poor little!"

"That's plain," said Thorpe, shrugging his shoulders, and I sometimes think Clara Denton gains a fellow to low, calling out death or matrimony besides the charms. She still not listen to reason, on account of mamma's."

Amy sat in perfect silence, twisting the cherry ribbon of her apron round and round her slender fingers, and thinking, though, while her husband imbibed the morning paper and began to glance hastily through the columns. At length she sprang up.

"Charley, I wish you would order the carriage round in half an hour. I want to go out shopping."

Mr. Thorpe raised his eyebrows deprecatingly.

"I know my purse isn't unlimited, dear."

"No—I shall coax Dick to go with me."

A sudden light, a pretty head bowed thinly through the clouds of those specks that clothed round the precincts of Mr. Fairlie's sanctum above stairs, and a soft, wheedling voice fell on his ear:

"Dick, dear!"

"Hello!"

"Are you very busy?"

"Not particularly." Mr. Dick was staring out of the window with his head considerably higher than his head. "Why?"

"I wish you would go out with me this morning."

"Possession—eh, sir! Whose? Thorpe's!"

"Oh, but I want you, Dick. We'll go round by that picture store and select those engravings, and then we'll see about those rare old books for Charlie's birthday, and afterwards we can stop and look at that merchaeum you're so enthusiastic about, and then we can take a turn in the Park, after I have stopped at Madame Lurigne's one minute."

My little Amy! The mission was slipped edgewise in, amid a multitude of tempting plans, just as a bitter pill or medicine is buried under some nice piece of currant jelly! The allusion to the merchaeum turned the wavering scale in Dick Fairlie's mind, and he yielded.

"Well, if I must, I must," he admitted. "But only—"

Amy did not stay to hear the conclusion of the sentence, but ran away to put on her things—a process, as our lady readers are well aware, which is not always accomplished.

"Now," said Mr. Richard, as he leaned back in the carriage, opposite the white lace hat and cashmere shawl of his pretty sister, "I want you to understand that this is a case of regular victimizing, young lady."

"No—only a very gentle preparation for the discipline you will undergo after you are married, Dick," said Amy, roguishly. "Come, I want to stop here."

"Why, I thought we were going to look at the merchaeum?"

"So we are, but you know I must go into Madame Lurigne's first."

Dick contorted his visage ruefully.

"I hate to go there."

"Of course you must," said Amy, decisively.

Dick chewed—a spotless although unpressing cigar—for a few minutes in silence, contemplating her parasol ruinously from side to side, and leaned listlessly against the table in Madame Lurigne's showy parlors, while shrinking, sidelong glances at him. What was it to him whether Amy decided to have ruffings or bouquets on the skirts of her dress, or to wear a mushroom or a plush? Bah, bosh, however, he turned round—a familiar name had struck upon his ear.

"Miss Denton left it here to be made up," said Madame Lurigne, walking over a glittering fabric of costly silk, whose white folds blended into rosy crimson when the light struck across them. "A rich thing, I assure you, and she is rich, too, I've heard. And do let me show you the lace for the trimmings—real point. It was two hundred dollars at least."

"Rather expensive, I should think," remarked the lady who was inspecting it.

Madame Lurigne waved her hand lightly.

"Miss Denton never cares for expense," said she. "I am making her a mantle silk for Miss Grey's wedding—a white brocade, with clusters of pearls—it will not cost less than three hundred when it is complete, with coiffure to match. Miss Denton is very rich indeed, and she never wears a costume under seventy-five dollars!"

"I should hardly suppose Judge Denton's income would warrant such lavish expenditure on his daughter's part," remarked the lady, severely.

"Oh, but you see, she is one of Clara Denton?" said an elegantly dressed matron, an acquaintance of Mrs. Thorpe's, who was lounging on a sofa near the window by Dick. "She can by any possibility avoid it. Here's Madame Lurigne now; has she paid your bills, madame? Never mind, I know, bless us—such fellows!"

Madame Lurigne shrugged her shoulders.

"Why, really, it is some time since the little account has been balanced; but, of course, I know that makes no difference to me. She will marry rich, and I take very good care not to send in my bills to the judge! Last bill—last year, but I go my farther—that she expects soon to be engaged to a gentleman of wealth, and then there will be no further pecuniary embarrassment."

Madame Lurigne drooped the silk, and glided gracefully down the long room towards Mrs. Thorpe, who was looking over a table where French bonnets were arrayed in tempting luxuriance of lace and tulle, and flowers that looked as if they had come to rival their keepsake of the wood and valley.

"This is the very bonnet for Madame Thorpe," she added, in a high, shrill tone that Dick caught distinctly. "Only see those white jonquils, and the heart-shaped bronze lace that looks like frostwork among the delicate leaves. And the price is but forty-five paltry dollars!"

"I shall not buy anything so expensive," said Mrs. Thorpe, clapping her portemonnaie decidedly.

"Expensive! Does Madame Thorpe call that expensive?" Why, Miss Denton has just ordered an opera hat that was sixty dollars!"

Dick Fairlie dropped the parasol with a crash, and kicked it lightly to herself.

"Possibly—but I do not regulate my scale of expenditures by that of Miss Denton. I don't think I will buy the bonnet to-day."

"Come, Richard, I am through at last," she said, a moment afterwards.

But she had to repeat it, and finally to touch him on the arm ere she was able to rouse him from the absorbed reverie into which he had fallen.

"My parasol, Dick!"

Dick made a blind dive at one of the handles, and got himself hopelessly entangled in several yards of illusion.

"Eh—what? Where's—"

Amy came to his rescue, with a comic arch of her eyebrows, and carried him off in a state of unconcernable bewilderment.

"Of course he hasn't the least idea of what he's about, poor fellow!" she pondered, arranging her shawl in the carriage. "That was a splendid idea of mine, going to see that dress of Clara's. I knew it would go the rounds of the establishment, and I was pretty certain there were ladies enough present to ventilate the matter sufficiently. I couldn't have selected a more favorable opportunity than this for the discovery!"

The drive home was unsocial enough. Dick Fairlie was in a brown study all the way, and Mrs. Thorpe was wise enough to leave him to his own reflections. And when they had reached home he only remained long enough to see his sister safely established in the snowy-faced shadows of the curtained morning room, by the side of her baby, and then took his hat a second time, and went out.

Amy did not ask where he was going, but her blue eyes followed him wistfully. She was not quite certain that she had told quite all—even to him.

She was singing a melodious little cradle song in the misty twilight of that same evening—singing, as by a kind of instinct, as she cradle rocked, and her thoughts wandering far away upon the purple shadows of the sunset splendor, when Richard Fairlie came into the room and knelt over her low chair, placing a caressing hand on either shoulder, and looking archly into her surprised eyes.

"Dick! How you frighten me!"

"I'm going to startle you a degree farther," he said, smiling. "Amy, I have proposed and been accepted."

"Proposed!" echoed Amy, with a look of blank astonishment, with not a little dismay mingled in its varied emotions. "Oh, Dick, you surely have not been so rash—so blind!"

"Even so," he returned, composedly. "Will you not say you are glad to welcome to your new sister-in-law? She stands close beside you, waiting for a sister's loving kiss."

And Amy sprang to her feet, only to fold Ettie Vere to her heart.

"My darling! I could not have wished so sweet a surprise!"

"He would have me come and tell you myself," murmured Ettie, hiding her face among the soft blushes. "I am very happy, Amy—so happy!"

"So am I," said Mr. Richard Fairlie, drawing the light, drooping figure to his own side with a proud respect of possession. "I think I am the happiest of you all. And you approve my choice, eh, Amy?"

He read the answer, plainer than words could have syllabled it, in the sunshine of her radiant face as she lifted it to his.

Miss Denton was considerably mortified when she learned that the wealthy Dick Fairlie, whom she had supposed her devoted slave, was formally engaged to the wife of the insignificant little wax doll, Ettie Vere!" And to this day she has never discovered what secret influence set him free from the network of her fascinations. Nemo while the bill at Madame Lurigne's is not yet settled, neither is it likely to be, until some other rich victim comes within the circle of her cyren spell. Clara hopes the milliner won't get out of patience, and thinks what a dreadful thing it would be if she should be left to pay it after all.

As for Dick and Ettie—we beg pardon, Mr. and Mrs. Fairlie—they are quite as happy as Amy Thorpe and her husband, and it would be totally impossible to be any happier than that!

NO!

His was a heart so true and strong,
So wise, so full of manly love,
So fit for woman's trust,
That when she spoke the fatal "No!"
It smote him like a thrill of woe,
That crushed him to the dust.

The why we never knew, still less
Could hazard a presumptuous guess,
So reticent is pain;
We only know that cold take
The hand he offered by mistake,
Or offered but in vain.

And all men noted from that day
He moved as in a hluded way,
Unlike his active, wilful part;
Ah, what mysterious change of state
One simple syllable can create
Within the heart of man.

And she lived revenge apart,
Nor gave to him a single heart,
Until the day she died,
When, to the friends around her bed,
She bade them tell him, as he said,
"They me by his side."

ANGELINE.

BY HAROLD PERCY.

It was soon after the unsuccessful assault of General Upton before Petersburg that I made my acquaintance of the romantic story. My love of adventure had led me to the theatre of your civil war, and I had immediately enrolled in the ranks under one of the militia, and received a wound which rendered me incapable of further exertion for some time.

I was therefore ordered to a private house in the neighborhood, where surgical attendance could be procured, and resolved to make the best of a bad matter by awaiting patiently my recovery.

I had been in this situation about a week when Dr. Bayard asked me if I did not want a companion. There was a Southern Colonel, he said, who had lost both legs, one above and one below the knee, who needed better accommodations than they had in the hospital, and if I was willing they would remove him to the house.

I agreed, and they brought him over.

His name was Frank ——, and he was a native of Louisiana. He was intelligent and well informed, although he had acquired a rude and careless habit of speaking by continual contact with roughs (his regiment was from Richmond and consisted of rowdies, unemployed overseers and negro drivers, brave but lawless fellows), and we soon became firm friends.

He had related all the adventures of the campaign to me, when one day he tossed me a photograph, saying with a sad, cold smile:

"There's the hero of as romantic a story as you have ever heard."

It was a picture of perhaps twenty-five, small, ruddy, girlish face, and sparkling dark blue eyes.

"Who is it?" I asked.

"Colin Haines," he replied, and tossed me another, a boy of sixteen, with eyes almost black, and a handsome face.

"Who is this?" I asked again.

"That's an open question," he answered. "That girl was Rose."

"Is he a relative of the other?"

"Yes, but how nearly related is, as I said before, an open question. He was certainly not less than a cousin."

"Well," said I, "it wants two hours of ten time; tell me the story, as your very best style."

Frank threw his arm over my head, and told me, nearly as follows,

THE STORY OF ANGELINE.

Colin Haines was a native of Louisiana, and was about ten years younger than I am. He was not born very near where I lived, and I first became acquainted with him when he was about sixteen years of age. He was then just coming out as an author; I was reading law. We were pretty intimate, and associated together. His principal companion was his cousin, about my age, a brave fellow, but a great scoundrel, whom they called Pet. Rose was a very pretty, shy girl, but I never saw her. All I knew is that Col was in love with her, deep enough, and that a little more than a year after she left, just after the birth of her first child, the boy you have there, who was called Harry. How much her death affected Col or Pet, I can't say, but I know that it did not make them any better.

About six months after this Col fell in love with Angeline, a beautiful octoroon girl. How and when this happened he was hardly eighteen, and she was a coquette of twenty-five. Yet he loved her madly, and I think she was then as fond of him as ever that she would own. Anyhow, in about a month she jilted him boldly, just after he had been negotiating for the transfer of her property to himself. I know, and swore all kinds of oaths that he would win her yet, and then let her know that he could remember her slights. He could forgive. And he kept his word pretty well.

In a few months he tried again, and was successful. I don't know how he won her, except that he began to regain her confidence he used to go down to the graveyard where his old love was buried, and there cry over it by the hour that he would marry Mary. He did this because he loved her so well that he dared not trust himself, lest she should not forgive him.

But about this time Pet died.

I never heard him say that he knew Col loved Angeline, but I think he was just big a fool to care. When they said he was near death Col went to see him. He staid all night, and when they were left alone just before daybreak, Pet said:

"Col, I am going to die. Very soon, too."

"Why, no, old fellow, don't say so!"

"I hope so," says he, "though I've been a bad boy enough in my day."

"Well, I don't see what boy of yours will have no father or mother when you are dead. I want you to tell Bess, if you should meet her in another world, that as long as I live I shall not want for a friend. I will always be like a brother to him for her sake."

"Ah, I say Pet, "I'll tell her. She loved you, I know, and loved her boy."

"Well," says Colin again, "I promise you on your dying bed that I will be all the good to him I can."

"God bless you, Col," said Pet, "and make you a better man."

And then a little while after Pet died.

He was a bold, tall, brave-looking fellow, and many a heart he had broken. He was often asked to be twin devils, people said, and who there was that Pet couldn't win with his tall, slender person, and then, with his curly, Col hair, and his ruddy cheeks and keen blue eyes. They were both handsome fellows, brave and smart, too, the crack shots of the county.

Well, as I said, Pet died and Col took charge of the boy. Some said it was like own, but I don't believe it. Col became the chief of a large factory in one of the cities, and used to take Mary to drive with a dashing span of gray horses. She was not rich, and everybody so want to marry her. He loved her, I know he did, if ever a man loved a woman; but his oath bound him, so he could not marry as he liked elsewhere. And he promised to make her his wife to serve his own purposes, and she, poor thing, though she was a coquette, was the truest love I ever did like him, with so much wit and no principle.

Well, the end of it was that he deceived her right well, and before long she found it out completely at his mercy. She asked him to have her, and he told her that he dared not. He took the trouble to tell her how if he was free. She came to him one night when he was alone in the office, and he looked the door while they talked it over. She went down on her knees and cried and begged him to marry her. He raised her up and kissed her, and offered to go through a mock ceremony to make every one think that they were married, and then to take her to Italy and be all to her that a husband could be; but he would not break his oath, that oath he swore he loved her. He has told me often that he would never forgive himself for plotting to ruin a helpless girl. She did not accept the offer, but resolved to await the course of events and brave it out. And she did, with a temper that I would not have thought was in her, giving back scorn for scorn, and holding her head high enough above those who thought to despise her for her sin. Col gave her plenty of money, all that he could spare, and when the child was born (it was a girl) she was treated like a princess. She was not very old when they found she was a mute, and he named her Angeline.

I am getting before my story, but when I saw her twelve years after her beauty eclipsed anything I have ever seen, and I have been all over the world. Her features resembled those of Eugenie of France, but there was a look so innocent and pure out of those large blue eyes that I am bound to say I never saw her rival. Only she had not the gift of speech.

Col loved her deeply as soon as he knew that she was deaf and dumb. There seemed to be a new tie in her helplessness that bound him to protect her.

Pet's boy was growing up fast, and Col did not forget that promise, but he became more and more reckless every day. When the Crimean war broke out he went to England and got a commission in some regiment of infantry. They were soon ordered out, and Col was in many a hard battle. He was a splendid soldier, but he would quarrel with his brother officers, and killed two men in duels while he was there. He used to send Mary plenty of money, that he got by writing stories and correspondence from the camp, but I don't know that he ever wrote to her in anything but a business way. When Angeline was about ten years old she wrote him a letter, and he sent back his photograph, but no message with it.

He was in the Austrian war next, and since in every quarrel that broke out till this rebellion. As soon as he heard of that he came home and joined a regiment at Baton Rouge, directly the State passed the secession ordinance. Mary lived close by the city, but he did not go to see her. He wrote a long letter, though, to her, and another to Angeline, and sent them his portrait again.

Harry soon joined the regiment as a lieutenant. I was then a captain, Col was soon made colonel. We had a year at the front, and then went back to Baton Rouge to recruit and take a little rest. Mary now lived in the city, and mingled with a few select friends, chosen from the élite of the place.

By some means Harry got access to this circle and began to try to play off upon Ange the same game that Col had won with her mother. I found this out and told him.

I did not want to see that young scamp, just as much like Pet as he could be in his devilish cunning, deceive the poor artless thing, and I thought this the right way to thwart him.

Col went right to Harry's room and told him, in plain English, to leave Ange alone and never try to see her again, if he wanted to keep out of trouble.

With some men that would have been enough, but Harry had much of Pet's temper, and they two passed high words. The end of it was that Harry challenged Col, and I remember that Col said to the one who brought the message:

"I swore that I would protect him; and yet if we meet I shall kill him. Tell him that I cannot accept the cartel."

Col looked grave then, but that night we went to a levee and they branded him as a coward. I was mad enough, but I knew that words could not express Col's feelings. He look just like a corpse when he came around to where some hard words were being bandied. I had struck down one dastard who had hissed the word at my side, and his friends were making a noise about it. I defied them all, and when Col came they slunk away.

Without a word he took my arm and we went out.

He never spoke all the way home, and only said good-night when we parted at the door of his room, which was next to mine. He sat up late writing, and I felt sure he was going to accept the challenge.

After he had gone to bed I got up and went to his room. I was going to tell him how foolish it was for these boys to hiss "Coward!" at him, who had fought seventeen duels, and been in at least twenty desperate battles, besides skirmishes innumerable, and bearing as he did the scars of mortal combat in every part of his person.

But he was asleep, and I did not awake him, though he heard me come in, and turned himself in his bed and said, in a low, pitiful tone:

"Is my honor questioned?"

Poor fellow, it was not, only by them whose opinion was not worth minding, and even they knew better, only they thought it would be fine sport to see the steady old duellist shoot Harry, who was not very popular among them, or spit him on his sword.

How I cursed them!

And Harry, the young ingrate! I hoped that Col would meet him, and shoot him dead on the spot, for daring to insult his benefactor and guardian.

And I knew that if they did meet, death was certain for him at least, for Haines never missed.

And then poor Col muttered something about his Mary, and his child, now and then talking of his wife, as though they had been married. I looked at his handsome features, and thought of Harry's skill. I knew the chances were fifty to one that he would never sleep again till the sleep of death.

I am called a brave man, but that didn't keep me from sitting down on the bed and crying like a child. Then I came softly out, and as I closed the door I heard him say, still dreaming:

"Is my honor questioned?"

The next morning he sent to Harry that he was ready to meet him at any time and place, with any weapons.

Just after dinner they met, a little out of the city, with pistols. I was Col's second. He never spoke, but just to tell me what he had done, till just as they were ready to stand to the mark. Then he came up to me, and said:

"God bless you, old fellow, you have been a good friend to me," and then grasped my hand and bid me good-bye.

I said:

"If you should fall I'll see that you don't go unavenged."

He turned, and said:

"I shall not die alone; I trust myself for that."

And then the signal was given.

The duel was of the kind called barriere, but both fired at the same instant, and without advancing. Both fell heavily.

We raised Col up, and found he was shot in the chest. He was not dead, and soon opened his eyes.

"Are you much hurt?" said I.

"Yes," said he, "I've got my death wound. We'll both go to the judgment together, and let Bess judge whether I have or have not kept my word to her and to her boy. If they had not called me a coward I would have kept it better, but I could not stand that, any more than I could to see my poor Ange betrayed. But it is all over now. Look in the drawer on the right hand side of my escritoire, and you'll find my last will and testament. I was not foolish enough to think that Harry would miss for the first time when he fired at me."

He had talked so fast and earnestly that he was quite exhausted. He shut his eyes and let his head rest on my hand, and directly he fell into a kind of stupor. He was that way perhaps ten minutes, and then he just opened his eyes, and said:

"Pray for me, Frank!"

I looked around, and there was the parson coming; Holy Davie, they called him, and said I to him:

"Would you offer a bit of a prayer for the bravest man in Christendom?"

And he answered:

"Yes; directly," and went to trying to talk to Col. That made me mad, and I shoved out a revolver, and said:

"Now, pray for him; it's what he's asked for, and what he shall have. Go in sharp, or I'll send you before him."

He tried to make some apology, but said I again:

"Down on your knees, and pray for the bravest man and biggest sinner that ever stepped!" and he went in without a word.

Well, he prayed then, it might be five minutes, and then I told him to hold and blow a bit.

But there was no need of any one praying; poor Col. was dead.

Some of the boys just sat down and cried, but I picked him right up in my arms, and carried him to the house. There I found Harry, shot just as fair in the centre of the forehead as any one could be. They said he never breathed after he fell. We had them laid out in the same room, not far from each other, for I knew that neither of them bore malice, only their fiery blood, mixed from the purest fountains of Britain and Spain, made them quarrel and fight. I thought then of what some had said as to their being father and son, and I went out and looked at them again, to note the resemblance.

There was some, but not much.

You knew what little hands and feet Col had? Well, Harry's were large, and he was altogether a heavier man than Col, though only about nineteen years of age. But he looked more like his mother than he did like Col or Pet, and I knew that Col told me the truth when he said that Pet had no cause to be angry with his wife.

I knew he would not have told me a lie, for he has told me everything, and many worse deeds than that.

Yet he was a good fellow at heart, and I could not help liking him. I'm not a saint myself, you know.

Before night Mary and her child came to see his dead body. I looked eagerly at both to read their feelings. I saw that Mary had fallen into a sort of listless apathy, from which even a sudden shock like this could hardly rouse her.

She came and looked at Colin, and kissed his lips tenderly and lovingly, but the all potent passions of her youth seemed to have burned out with the lapse of time, and she showed but little emotion.

She and her daughter were expensively dressed, and the beauty of the younger was brightened by every artificial grace and ornament that money could procure. I thought then as before that she was the most beautiful woman I had ever seen. She wept bitterly, and kissed her father's cold lips again and again, till her mother led her away. She would not go to see Harry, but afterwards, when she thought herself alone, I saw her steal in and lay a white rosebud upon his breast.

I knew then that she loved him, and I learned afterwards that Col might just as well have left Harry alone, on her account, since it was after all too late to save her.

We buried them the next day, and Colin's will was proved and executed. He left all his property to Angeline, except an annuity to me, and something to Mary. She, poor thing, did not need it long, for a week after she died, and they laid her beside him. They said it was consumption killed her.

Soon after this we were ordered to the front, and I tried in vain to hear from Ange. She had left Baton Rouge, and I could not discover her whereabouts. But last year, when I was down in Louisiana, I stopped a few days at a village in Terre Bonne. In rambling about I came to a convent, and as I was walking around it I saw a young girl at a window, playing with a baby. It only needed a second glance to satisfy me that it was Angeline, the mute, with Harry's child.

I looked at them a few moments, and then came away, but the next day I bribed one of the fathers, and he told me that she had made her fortune over to the Holy Church, only reserving a comfortable portion for herself, and taken up her abode there some time before the birth of her child. She was contented, he said, in her situation, and spent the most of her time with the infant.

But I guess she did not like to live so near the scene of war, for I heard about three months since that her child was dead, and that she had removed to the more secluded shelter of a nunnery in France, taken the irrevocable vows, and donned the veil for life.

That is all I could learn, and it is not at all probable that either you or I, on this side of the Styx, will ever hear more of the beautiful Angeline.

But for my part I have endeavored to make my love stories short as possible, for I saw by this how little an affair, when a man is in love, may injure him desperately, and change the even tenor of his way through all his life. Thus, you see, Mary Vail's first rejection of Colin was the first link in the chain of events which ended in his death, and had he, like me, avoided, as much as possible, any entanglement with the gentle sex, he might have been, saving the Yankee bullets, alive to this day.

I laughed, thanked him for his story, and turned my attention to the servant, who was just bringing in our evening meal.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

A down-east Yankee has invented a machine for grating people's feelings.

It is a good thing to be above-board, but generally a bad thing to be overboard.

A canter will give you ruddy cheeks; a decanter will give you a ruddy nose.

Mr. Wendell Phillips was riding in a railroad car, when he was addressed by a man of such rotundity that he seemed to carry everything before him. The man asked Mr. Phillips what was the object of his life.

"To benefit the negro," was the bland reply.

"Well, then, why don't you go South to do it?"

"That is worth thinking of. I see a white cravat around your neck; pray what is the object of your life?"

"To save souls from hell."

"May I ask you whether you propose to go there to do it?"

The South Carolinians may not belong to the association of "The Straightouts," but their coat-tails do.

There seems to be a great confusion of seasons in the South. Savannah, Branchville, Columbia, Charleston and Wilmington, have had their fall in the winter.

For some time past our armies in front of the rebel armies have fired all their salutes on account of Federal victories with shotted guns. Thus they salute at the same time friends and enemies.

Adam and Eve, after finding the apple, discovered they were a pair.

When you offer oats to a horse he may say neigh, but he don't mean it.

A schoolboy having goodnaturedly helped another in a difficult ciphering lesson, was angrily questioned by the dominie:

"Why did you work his lesson?"

"To 'lessen' his work," replied the youngster.

"It is a shame, husband, that I have to sit here mending your old clothes."

"Don't say a word about it, wife; the least said the soonest mended."

Lord Campbell, it is well-known, was fond of a joke, and sometimes had the tables turned upon himself. A few days before his death he met a barrister, who had grown very stout of late, and remarked:

"Why, Mr. ——, you are getting as fat as a porpoise!"

"Fit companion, my lord, for the great seal," was the ready repartee.

"Madam," said a gentleman to his wife, "let me tell you, facts are very stubborn things."

"Dear me, you don't say so," quoth the lady; "what a fact you must be."

A celebrated wit was asked why he did not marry a young lady to whom he was much attached. "I know not," he replied, "except the great regard we have for each other."

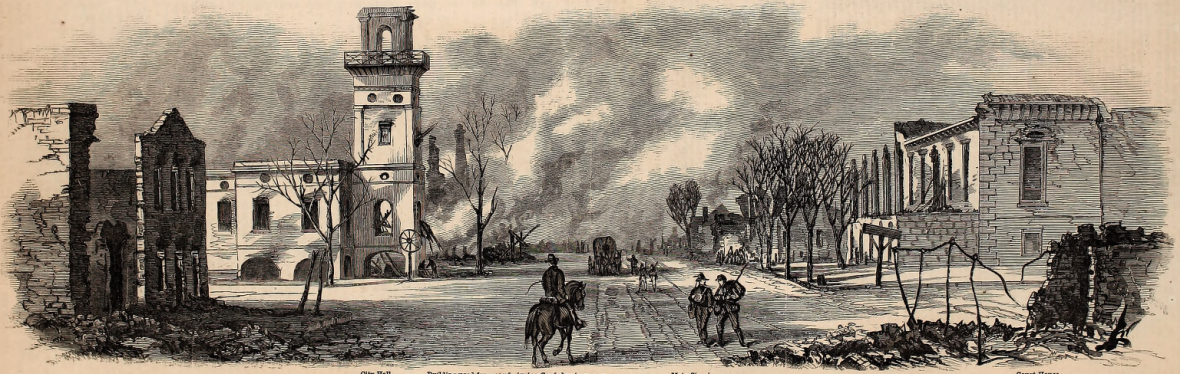
A correspondent of a Madras journal gives the following account of the ropetying trick, performed in his presence by an Indian juggler: "A native sat in a strong black wood armchair. We fastened a rope to his right arm, passed it under the arm of the chair, round the back, under the left arm, and then made it fast to his left arm. We passed the rope backward and forward in this manner five times. We then fastened the rope round the right arm with a triple knot, and winding it round the ropes passing behind the chair about twenty times, made a triple knot at the left arm. We then carried on the rope to the wrists, and made them fast by crossing, recrossing and knotting it. The thumbs were then tied together, and the rope carried back to the wrist and knotted. Afterwards we tied his legs together above the ankles, crossing and recrossing the rope in a complicated manner. We next bound his big toes together, and carried back the rope to the tie on his legs. We had used nineteen yards of rope—quite enough, we thought, to make him secure. The man could not move his hands either to his arms or his legs, so as to touch an end of the rope; and if he could have done so, they were tied so tightly as, in our judgment, to prevent him from using them. When he thought the tie was weak, he asked that it might be strengthened, gave us perfect liberty to tie him as we liked, and at his request we continued binding him after he appeared to us to be quite secure. More than twenty minutes elapsed before we had finished binding him. I afterwards put a paper round the rope where it crossed between his legs, and where the last knot was tied, and sealed it with sealingwax and stamp. We left him at the west side of my study, seated in the black wood armchair before mentioned, he promising that when we returned he would be sitting in a teak armchair on the east side, with the ropes arranged exactly as we left them. In five minutes he summoned us, and we found the paper and seal undamaged, and every knot and portion of the rope as we had arranged them, only he was seated in the teak armchair. I wished to see if he could unfasten himself without the spiritual aid rendered so freely to the Davenport Brothers, and left him to do so. In four minutes and a half he recalled us. We found the rope stretched out over the floor, and the man unbound and erect before us. I told him there were men in England who were bound in the same way, but had spirits to untie them, at which he laughed the laugh of the incredulous."

Many men have relieved themselves of dyspepsia by not drinking, even water, during meals. No animal, except man, ever drinks in connection with his food. Man ought not to. Try this, dyspeptics; and you will not wash down mechanically what ought to be masticated and ensalivated before it is swallowed.

MODERN MARRIAGE.

The "Marriage à la Mode" of Hogarth has its counterpart if not its parallel in modern society. We know very well that both the teachings of the Bible and the instincts of nature enjoin as an inviolable condition to the compact of matrimony the existence of mutual love; but civilization, with its advanced mode of living, and circumstances exceptional in our history, have introduced new interests into the compact—interests of so great a moment that men often sacrifice the original condition so solemnly enjoined to meet these requirements. We look in vain in the exaggerated life of our time for instances of that mutual self-devotion which seem to exist now only in the elegantly-bound edition of the poets lying on the drawing-room table. That there should be a prudential consideration as to ultimate provision, no sane man will refuse to allow; but that natural feelings should be crushed and sacrificed to the absorbing interests of wealth or position—that two beings should enter into the compact, like a couple of sharpers trying to get the best of each other—that domestic life should be arranged in deception and commenced in perjury, are evils which lie at the very base of whatever domestic misery exists amongst us. We have no wish to advocate sentimentalism, but honesty. It has always existed in the natural perversity of things, that young people, with bright blue eyes and no earthly prospects, are sure to fall in love with each other, and a great deal of misery ensues from it; but even this, this foolish yet honest compact, is far better than what we see going on around us daily. Parents have preached the doctrines of wealth and position into their children's ears so perseveringly, that even the generosity of youth is chilled into a cold and precocious selfishness.

By the force of early associations, as well as by the exigences of exaggerated life, young men are driven into looking upon matrimony in inseparable connection with wealth; whilst the hearts of our young ladies flutter most not at the natural fascinations of the man, but at the more substantial fascination of the balance at his bankers. And no wonder that they should—no wonder that the generous warmth of youth is chilled—no wonder that the ingenuous purity of the girl is sullied by mercenary calculations. They look about them and they see how the power of wealth is worshipped in all ranks of society—how men bow down before it—how it asserts itself from the ragged urchin in the streets, who, with sixpence in his pocket, lords it over the beggar, up to the vulgar millionaire, who buys with his gold position and political power. They see the gifted, the proud and the honored humbling themselves at the feet of ignorance, vulgarity and even crime; when that ignorance drives the best horses; that vulgarity gives the best dinners, and that crime has the largest balance at its bankers.



How can we wonder, then, that young girls are mercenary, and young men selfish? Or how can parents, who have labored so assiduously to corrupt the hearts of their innocent children by instilling into them these worldly maxims, wonder when they see those children grow up cold, calculating, covetous—when they come to them in after-life with the weeping tale of a wretched home and a blighted existence; or when, in the pride of affluence and prosperity, they leave their cunning teachers to die in the chill penury of neglected age? These are truths which lie at the root of the domestic evils of the time; they generate and foster that selfishness which characterises the social existence of the present day more than at any other time in the history of the country; hence arise those unhappy marriages which begin by perjury in the church, and end in exposure at the Divorce Court. A fatal system which debars brave and honorable men, who are willing to fight out the battle of life, from the consolations of home—which starts into being modes of living illicit and criminal, where natural feeling is degenerated into licentiousness—irreparable shame is entailed upon the heads of the innocent; and, finally, which summons into existence, as from some dark world of evil, the horrible demon, Infanticide, now haunting our towns and villages, and prevailing to that frightful extent as to become the lamentation of every honest man, and the crying shame of this Christian county. Such are a few of the results of this impetuous, exaggerated life, as pertains to the institution of matrimony.

New Mode of Preserving Meat.—A Mr. Morgan, Professor of Anatomy in the Irish College of Surgeons, announces that he has arrived at a process of preserving meat which will remain fit for food any reasonable time, which retains its entire nutritive qualities, and in flavor is hardly to be distinguished from newly-killed food. Moreover, the process of effecting this is more economical than any other. This process is more simple, though most ingenious, both which qualities, perhaps, it derives from being an humble imitation of nature. Instead of steeping the meat in brine, instead of placing it under an exhausted receiver and then causing the emptied pores to imbibe a rush of brine, as was unsuccessfully attempted some five-and-twenty years ago, Professor Morgan follows a higher model. Wherever nature has propelled the vital fluid during life there he injects his preserving fluid after death. To spare our readers anatomical details as much as possible, we will merely say that Prof. Morgan requires his victim to be killed by some instantaneous process, such as dividing the spine. He then at once cuts open the chest, and inserts a tube into the aorta, or great arterial duct of the mammalian system. By means of this tube he forces diluted brine through the arteries, veins, and most minute vessels of the carcase. He thus—and in about two minutes in the case of an ox—washes all these ducts perfectly clear of blood, which he prevents from returning, as in nature, to the heart, by severing its place of entrance at the left ventricle. He then closes that aperture, and at the aorta, by the same means, he injects his preserving fluid of brine and saltpetre, augmented at will by any nutritive components, such as sugar, phosphoric and lactic acid, and even a solution of spices. With such incredible minuteness does this fluid permeate the whole body that wherever in life a cut would have produced blood, there, after this process, would the preserving fluid exude. For this preparation of a whole ox it requires, Professor Morgan tells us, not more than 10 minutes, and the cost is about a shilling. The meat lies thus for about an hour, is then dried, and packed, and when re-opened for use will be found to have lost not a single one of its nutritive qualities, can be used in every possible form of cooking, and retains all the flavor of fresh meat.

There are in Europe 43 reigning Sovereigns, not including those who possess titles only. Of these 43, nine belong to the Roman Catholic religion, but one of that number is excommunicated; 31 are Protestants, one is of the orthodox Greek Church, one a Mahometan, and the 43d is the Pope. The Catholics have two Emperors—Austria and France; four Kings or Queens—Bavaria, Spain, Portugal and Saxony; two Princes—of Lichtenstein and Monaco. The excommunicated Sovereign is King Victor Emmanuel. The 31 who protest the Roman Catholic religion are nine Kings or Queens—of Great Britain, Prussia, Sweden and Norway, Denmark, Holland, of the Belgians, Hanover, Greece, and Wurtemburg; six Grand Dukes—Baden, Hesse Cassel, Mechlenburg-Schwerein, Mechlenberg-Strelitz, Oldenburg, and Saxe-Weimar; seven Dukes—Anhalt, Brunswick, Nassau, Saxe-Meinengen, Saxe-Altenburg, Saxe-Coburg, and Schleswig-Holstein; nine Princes—Lippe-Detmold, Lippe-Schaumberg, Reuss-Greiz, Reuss-Schleitz, Schwarzburg-Rudolstadt, Schwarzburg-Sonderhaussen, and Waldeck; one Elector—Hesse-Darmstadt; one Landgrave—Hesse Homburg. The orthodox Greek Sovereign is the Emperor of Russia, and the Mussulman Sovereign, the Sultan. There are besides in Europe seven Republics, two exclusively Catholic—San Marino and Andorre; and five where the majority of the inhabitants are Protestants—Switzerland, Hamburg, Bremen, Frankfort and Lubeck.

THE TWO VILLAGES.

Over the river, on the hill,
Lieth a village white and still;
All around it the forest trees
Shiver and whisper in the breeze;
Over it sailing shadows go
Of soaring hawk and screaming crow,
And mountain grasses, low and sweet,
Grow in the middle of every street.

Over the river, under the hill,
Another village lieth still;
There I see in the cloudy night
Twinkling stars of household light,
Fires that gleam from the smithy's door,
Mists that curl on the river's shore;
And in the road no grasses grow,
For the wheels that hasten to and fro.

In that village on the hill
Never is sound of smithy or mill;
The houses are thatched with grass and flowers,
Never a clock to tell the hours;
The marble doors are always shut,
You cannot enter in the hall or hut;
All the village lie asleep;
Never a grain to sow or reap;
Never in dreams to moan or sigh,
Silent, and idle, and low they lie.

In that village under the hill,
When the night is starry and still,
Many a weary soul in prayer,
Looks to the other village there,
And weeping and sighing, longs to go
Up to that home from this below;
Longs to sleep by the forest wild,
Whither have vanished wife and child,
And heareth, praying, his answer fall,
"Patience! that village shall hold ye all!"

From this time it almost seemed as if a new life began for Maude Hillary. No more careless idling over new music, no more eager commencements of expensive fancywork that was never to be finished! After Miss Hillary's return to the Cedars, any one taking the trouble to watch her closely might have perceived a wonderful alteration in her conduct—a change that was almost a transformation in her very nature. When she opened her piano now, it was for no idle trifling with fashionable difficulties, no coquetting with shakes and skipping of arpeggios. She practised steadily and for hours together. Might not the time be very near at hand in which she would be called upon to gird on her armor and join the ranks of the bread winners? She thought of herself in a dingy London street, somewhere in the dreary region between Holborn and the New Road —the region which was once a fair expanse of pleasant meadow-land. She thought of herself toiling as so many women toiled, leading the same dull life from day to day, and her courage did not fail her even before that dismal picture. It was not likely that this change in Maude Hillary could escape the notice of so observant a young lady as Miss Desmond. Julia saw and wondered, but she was far from guessing the real cause of Maude's unusual gravity.

"I suppose she is making herself unhappy about Harcourt Lowther," thought Miss Desmond. "These fortunate people always contrive to find one crumpled leaf in their beds of roses. She is making herself miserable about that handsome, worthless soldier, and she thinks herself hardly used because she cannot play at love in a cottage, with a rich mercantile father to pay the expenses of the idyllic ménage."

This was how Julia Desmond accounted for Maude's long intervals of absent brooding, and that melancholy shadow which settled on her face whenever she fancied herself unnoticed, and for a while relaxed the heroic effort with which she tried to keep her promise and guard her father's secret. It was a very hard struggle. All the young idlers, the government clerks, the briefless but literary young barristers, the rising artists who had narrowly escaped making palpable hits at the Royal Academy, or at a temple of art which they irreverently alluded to as the "Brish Inst," all the accustomed Twickenham loungers flocked down to the Cedars to keep their Christmas holidays in the house of a gentleman whom they regarded as a sort of commercial Midas—a Moorgate street Fortunatus, from whose inexhaustible coffers flowed the golden waters of perpetual prosperity, and Maude received all the old incense, and was fain to smile something like the old smiles upon her worshippers, while her heart ached with an unceasing pain, and a hidden dread that was like a palpable burden weighed for ever on her breast.

"Oh, if they knew—if they only knew!" she thought. "They court me because they think I am rich, perhaps; but if they only knew what an imposture all this splendor is—these lights and flowers, and grapes, and pines, and Sèvres china and Venetian glass, and all this long parade of dinner; if they knew that poverty and disgrace may come to us before the New Year has well begun!"

Sometimes, in her utter weariness of spirit, sometimes when the social comedy seemed almost too hard to act, Miss Hillary felt suddenly tempted to turn upon her admirers, and cry to them:

"Why do you torment me with your hackneyed compliments? I am not the daughter of a millionaire; my father is only an imprudent speculator, who is hovering on the verge of a black abyss of bankruptcy and ruin. Go and offer your worship in some solvent temple, and leave me alone with my father and his sorrows."

This, or something akin to this, Miss Hillary was at times sorely tempted to utter. But she kept her promise. She had promised that no word or action of hers should betray the rottenness of her father's position, and she kept a close watch upon herself. Her adorers—who were by no means so mercenary as she thought them—perceived that something was amiss with their goddess, but were far from associating anything so vulgar as the state of the money market with the lessened lustre of her smiles.

"She's engaged to some fellow in the army, and her father won't let her marry him, and the fellow writes her worrying letters; Miss Desmond told me as much," the loungers said to one another, when they confided in each other about Miss Hillary.

The brilliant Julia had taken care to let Maude's admirers know that her heart had long been bestowed upon a remote object; but she did not go so far as to reveal the name of Miss Hillary's chosen lover; and Francis Tredethlyn had no suspicion that Maude Hillary, and the beautiful heiress of whom his master had so often spoken, were one and the same person. He knew nothing of this; he only knew that Maude seemed as remote from his sphere as the distant stars that shone coldly upon him out of a steel-blue winter sky when he looked from his window at the Cedars. He spent his Christmas at the Cedars—for Mr. Hillary had been specially cordial and hospitable to him of late, and had resumed all his old graciousness of manner to Julia.

And the private theatricals, the elegant drawing-room exhibition of amateur histrionics, which Maude had planned so merrily in the autumn, were to take place on the first night of the new year—now, when the poor girl's heart was sinking under the dull pain of that perpetual burden, that dreary terror of the disgrace which might be so near.

She had told her father that a miracle might be wrought before the 10th of January. Of what had she thought or dreamed when she held out that hope? What daring fancy had been engendered out of the excitement of the moment? There are times when a woman feels capable of becoming a social Joan of Arc, a bloodless Charlotte Corday; but then the enthusiasm, the exaltation of the moment is so apt to pass with the moment. There had been a vague but desperate intention lurking in Maude Hillary's mind when she had encouraged her father by those hopeful speeches; but the days were creeping past, the new year was close at hand, and nothing had been done. Nothing had been done, and now Miss Hillary was tormented all day long about those wonderful private theatricals, which were to surpass every drawing-room performance since the days when the unhappy daughter of the Cæsars played a soubrette for the delight of that taciturn king and grandfather-in-law who did not like to laugh.

All arrangements for the grand entertainment had been made before Mr. Hillary's household removed to Brighton. The play had been selected, the characters allotted to the individuals who were supposed, or who supposed themselves, to be most fitted to play them, but not without as much shuffling and changing as the kings and queens undergo in a game of cards.

The drama finally chosen was the "Lady of Lyons," selected, no doubt, on the grand principle in accordance with which all amateurs go to work, i.e., because it is a play which specially requires accomplished actors in every one of its characters. Of course Maude was to be the Pauline. Was she not sole daughter and heiress of the master of the house, at whose expense all the business was to take place? If she had been redhaired, or humpbacked, or lame, the amateurs could scarcely have done otherwise than choose her as the representative of the lovely Mademoiselle Deschappelles. But as she was one of the fairest daughters ever spoiled by a wealthy merchant, she was really created for the part, as it seemed; and she had only to order her dresses and let down her sunny hair in the classic disorder of the period, and she would be the loveliest Pauline that ever won the simple heart of an aspiring young gardener. But how about Claude? At first every one of the amateurs had desired to play Claude, and nothing but Claude; to wear that impossible velvet coat, with its lavish embroidery of gold and spangles; to snub Beauseant and to patronize Damas; to flourish diamond snuffboxes and gold rings and filmy ruffles of point d'Alençon, which are so becoming to the unhappy amateur, whose hands are apt to assume the rich purple hues of raw beef under the influence of extreme terror; to hold Miss Hillary in their arms and cry, "Oh, rapture!" in a ponderous bass voice, apparently situated somewhere in those martial jackboots, without which Claude would be less than Claude. To do all this seemed to the young men at the Cedars a glory and delight which would be cheaply won by the cutting of one another's throats in a champ clos.

And then to what base hypocrisies these amateur actors descended! declaring to one another that after all Claude was not such a great part! Nay, indeed, was not the heroic gardener something of a spoon, liable to provoke laughter if his velvet coat failed to fit, or his humble blouse looked too much like a boy's pinafore? Claude might be a very fine part, the amateurs argued to each other, in a regular theatre, where there were the gallery fellows to applaud the long speeches, and to stamp their hob-nailed boots in the great situations, and all that sort of thing, you know; but your drawing-room audiences are apt to laugh at strong sentiment; and, in short, for a private performance, Damas, or Beauseant, or Glavis were the great parts.

So there was a good deal of chopping and changing, with vengeful feelings attendant thereupon; and at last, after almost all the privileged guests at the Cedars had made themselves hoarse in the endeavor to cultivate that bass voice and peculiar melodious gurgle so often heard on the stage, and so rarely heard off it, after innumerable tryings on of velvet coats and cocked hats before the cheval glasses, it transpired all at once that nobody wanted to play Claude Melnotte. The noblest hearts sank with a sickly terror before the thought of all Twickenham assembled in solemn conclave to listen to those long speeches with which the peasant husband endeavors to appease the natural anger of his bride. One by one the amateurs had made the awful discovery that after all there is some touch of art, not to be learned in a day, even in the actor's trade. One by one they had discovered that they lacked physique for the leading character, and that after three acts or so of blank verse they were apt to become hoarse and roopy, and to break ignominiously from that melodious bass gurgle into a treble squeak. So it came about that there was no one to play Claude, and Miss Hillary clasped her hands in anguish and demanded what was to become of her. All Twickenham and Hampton Court, Richmond and Ham, and all sorts of people from town invited to witness the "Lady of Lyons," and no Claude Melnotte! One of the Government clerks, who fancied himself an embryo Buckstone, suggested "Box and Cox" as a fitting substitute for the drama; but Miss Hillary turned from him with disdain.

"'Box and Cox!'" she exclaimed, contemptuously. "Why, my dresses are all ordered, and the white satin for the wedding-dress is to be five-and-twenty shillings a yard. I must have some one for Claude."

And then at last it was discovered that Francis Tredethlyn, who had volunteered to carry a tea-tray or a coal-scuttle, or to announce a carriage, or to perform any ignominious part in the drama for Miss Hillary's pleasure—it was discovered all at once that this young man was able to act. He was no untaught Macready, no ready-made Kean, but he was able to do what the best of the Government clerks and literary barristers failed in doing—he was able to roll out the melodious blank verse in a big, deep voice, that never failed him to the end of the chapter. The stage is almost as great a leveller as death himself, and on that little platform at Twickenham uneducated Francis Tredethlyn was quite as much at his ease as the well-bred young men about him—more at his ease, for he was not so bent upon distinguishing himself, and was indeed only eager to oblige Miss Hillary.

All this had happened before the autumn visit to Brighton, and now, when Maude returned to the Cedars, she found busy workmen making a perpetual hammering in the apartment which had been chosen for the scene of the entertainment. Mr. Hillary did everything in a superb manner; there was to be no pitiful contrivance of folding doors festooned by suburban carpenters, but accomplished people from town had come down to the Cedars, and a magnificent archway of white and gold spanned the lofty billiard-room, which the merchant had built at one end of his house. All the arrangements were to be perfection; the lighting of the small stage was to be a miracle of art, the grouping of the furniture had been studied by genre painters of no mean pretensions. Poor Maude grew sick at heart as she heard all these details discussed. She looked back and wondered, as she remembered what a frivolous creature she had been only a few months ago, and how this amateur dramatic performance had seemed a matter of supreme importance to her; and now she repeated the words mechanically during those long rehearsals, in the course of which the amateurs had so many angry disputations, and so cruelly victimised Mr. Hillary's pale sherry.

At last the New Year began, and at ten o'clock upon the first night in January long lines of carriages filled the avenue at the Cedars and the road outside the lodge gates, until the neighborhood was luminous with flaming lamps that glared redly in the winter darkness. People came from far and wide to see Miss Hillary play Pauline and to devour Mr. Gunter's supper, though Miss Hillary's heart might be breaking and the merchant's head splitting with the weight of care that pressed just now upon his overtaxed brain! But people do get through these things somehow; and Lionel Hillary walked about his drawing-rooms, looking supremely gentlemanly in a stiff cambric cravat, and uttering mild commonplaces for the edification of new arrivals.

People get through these things. Poor Maude's head ached with a dull pain as her maid arrayed her in a dress of white silk, showered with rose-buds, and flounced and looped with lace and ribbon. Would any of this finery be paid for? Miss Hillary wondered, as she saw her splendor reflected in the cheval glass, or was it altogether dishonesty and wickedness? She shuddered as she thought of this; but the entertainment of to-night was only a part of the grand hypocrisy which might help to float Mr. Hillary safely over the terrible crisis, and Maude determined to be true to her promise. So she smiled at Julia Desmond, when that young lady, who was to play Madame Deschappelles, came to exhibit herself in powder and patches, and brocade and diamonds, and with half the point lace in South Audley street bestowed upon her handsome person. Miss Desmond had consented with amazing graciousness to perform the matronly rôle allotted to her; but she had determined to look like a marquise of the time of Louis Quinze, and she had dispatched Francis Tredethlyn on half a dozen shopping expeditions, until that gentleman was fain to wonder how a few ribbons, brocaded fabrics and yellow old lace flounces could cost the big sums for which he wrote cheques in favor of the West End tradesmen to whom Julia sent him.

The two girls admired each other's dresses, and the maid joined in a perfect chorus of laudations with a young lady who would play the Widow Melnotte in a nine-guinea black moire antique and a point lace cap and apron, and who kept snatching a manuscript copy of her part from her pocket, and furtively gabbling its contents in dark corners. The girls admired each other, and sailed down the broad staircase together, and went straight to a little anteroom, where half a dozen gentlemen, in attitudes expressive of supreme mental agony, were bending over half a dozen copies of the "Lady of Lyons," and gabbling vehemently.

There is no occasion to describe this amateur performance at the Cedars, inasmuch as it very closely resembled all other amateur performances. Miss Hillary, stepping on to a stage for the first time, was, to say the least, not quite a Helen Faucit, and was on the point of breaking down now and then in some of her grand speeches; but she looked so beautiful in her perplexity and confusion, that the elegant audience encouraged and supported her by the gentlest tappings of spangled fans and pattings of tight kid gloves. There were no tiresome boys in the gallery to urge her to speak up; no critical chimneysweeps to murmur their disapproval, or hint that she had better go home and learn her part. There was only admiration for her timid loveliness, and the soft music of her tremulous voice.

Of course there were the usual number of dead pauses in the drama, technically known as "stage-waits," the solemn silences in which the actors stood still and looked imploringly on one another, while the voices of amateur prompters—always inciting their victims to the utterance of wrong speeches—were painfully audible throughout the assemblage. Mr. Tredethlyn rolled out his blank verse with a sturdy courage that was worthy of all praise; and if his hands were a little red, and his blue cotton blouse slightly suggestive of Newgate Market, he had acted with his brother soldiers in very rough amateur performances out in Van Diemen's Land, and now and then some touch of natural fire, some little bit of tender pathos, startled the wellbred audience into applause. It may be that now and then Francis Tredethlyn found himself carried away by the spirit of the scene. Did not that romantic drama bear some likeness to his own story? This beautiful Pauline, this unapproachable being whose lovely image filled the peasant's dreams, who was she but Maude Hillary herself? Perhaps if Miss Desmond had been the Pauline, Francis might have seemed as cold and tame as the rest of the Twickenham amateurs; but the eyes that looked at him tenderly or reproachfully to-night were the only eyes in all the world that had the power to move him deeply. He acted well, therefore, as the dullest man will act sometimes under the influence of some factitious excitement; and when the curtain fell upon the final scene of happy and triumphant love, the audience were loud in their praise of "that handsome-looking Mr. Tredethlyn, who was just the very man for Claude Melnotte."

Then there was a final parting of the curtains and a shower of bouquets, all in the orthodox style, and Maude felt perfumed petals fluttering about her as she curtseyed to her indulgent audience.

All through that last act she had surprised those wellbred spectators out of their natural languor. The Pauline who had been so tame and unimpassioned in the grand cottage scene was carried away by a strong tide of passionate feeling in that last act, where the half broken-hearted daughter pleads for her insolvent father. Sobs almost choked Miss Hillary's utterance more than once in this scene; and when at last her head lay for a few moments on Francis Tredethlyn's breast, the young man's martial decorations were met with real tears. The sight of that emotion moved him strangely, though he beheld in it nothing more than the natural excitement of a highly sensitive organization.

After the little ovation that came with the close of the drama, he followed Maude Hillary into the anteroom, where the rest of the amateurs were discussing the night's business, and flirting with the splendid Julia, and thence to the inner room, less brilliantly lighted, and quite unoccupied. Beyond this inner room there was another apartment—the study in which Francis had fallen an easy victim to the wiles of the Hibernian enchantress—and it was to this room that Maude hurried, still followed by Mr. Tredethlyn.

He had no business to follow her. He knew that very well. His business was with Julia, who had acted Madame Deschappelles with wonderful spirit, and for whom the evening had been one long triumph, inasmuch as her lace, and diamonds, and brocade, and dark eyes and white teeth had been the subject of universal admiration. Mr. Tredethlyn's business lay in that brilliantly lighted antechamber where Julia sat amongst the government clerks, and barristers, and grand military dandies, while an accompaniment of perpetually popping champagne corks mingled pleasantly with the noise of their laughter. He knew this, and yet he followed Maude to the dimly lighted study, where the red glow of the fire flickered on the bindings of the books and the frames of the pictures. He could not leave off being Claude Melnotte all in a moment. The exaltation of the mimic scene was still upon him. Just now he had been carried quite away by the influence of the poetic situation; and when he flung down the sham money, which was to release the merchant's daughter from her hated suitor, a warmer thrill of triumph had stirred his breast than had ever been engendered by the possession of Oliver Tredethlyn's thousands.

And now he could not fall back to his old position all at once. Only a minute or two ago Maude Hillary had been sobbing on his breast—his bride, his wife; and he half fancied he had some kind of right to sympathise with her emotion. He stopped suddenly on the threshold of the study, quite unmanned by the sight of Mr. Hillary's daughter half kneeling, half lying on the ground, with her face buried in the cushions of a sofa, and her hands clasped in a despairing attitude above the fair tangled hair that had so lately lain upon his breast. Her whole frame was shaken by the vehemence of her sobs; and before such a picture as this it was scarcely strange if poor country-bred Francis Tredethlyn quite forgot that he was not Claude Melnotte. He bent over the prostrate girl, and laid his big fingers gently upon one of those little wrists which had struggled so convulsively above her fair head.

"Miss Hillary," he exclaimed, "dear Miss Hillary, for pity's sake tell me what disturbs you—what has happened—what is wrong—or—I—I beg your pardon—you have overstepped yourself, and you are hysterical. I am not your maid."

"Oh, no, no," sobbed the girl, rising to her feet and standing before him, but with her face still hidden from him, hidden by her outspread hands and her disheveled hair.

"Shall I call Julia? she is in the room yonder."

"Oh, no! I—I want to speak to you, Mr. Tredethlyn; stay just a little, please. Ah! it is my hand, too crushed, but not maimed! In all the world there is no one else who can save me—and my father—my poor, miserable, bankrupt father!"

Frankie looked at Miss Hillary in complete bewilderment. Her father—her bankrupt father! Why, then, she was still thinking of the old commercial failure, and the commercial troubles of Honsicar Deschappelles; which character, by the way, had been enacted by a very young man of a sickly cast of countenance, and an inclination to hang his head deplorably throughout the progress of the drama. He had quite amusing anatomy to assign the elderly and ineligible characters to the youngest and meekest members of the company, whereby Honsicar Deschappelles is usually represented as a young person of some nineteen summers, with down in his hair, dimpy cheeks, supposed to express wrinkles, upon his face, and a tendency to squeakiness in his voice.

"I am sorry you are over-excited by the play," urged Frankie; "do let me call Julia."

"No!" cried Miss Hillary, dropping her hands from before her face. "Oh, Mr. Tredethlyn," she exclaimed, almost passionately, "can't you understand—can't you see that I am in trouble? Do you think, that I can have only would have made me cry as it did if it had not reminded me of my own sorrow? Mr. Tredethlyn—I—I—if you are a gentleman, as I think you would not be slow to do a kindness for any one who needed your help! I know that; and—I thought I could—I have courage to speak to you, but now the words won't come—I—"

Her dry lips seemed, but made no sound. She clasped her hands once more before her face. Heaven knows how desperate was the effort that she made. It is not such an easy matter for a shy young girl to plunge even though the borrower may be young and beautiful, and accustomed to overpraised salutations.

"Miss Hillary," the speak of help—needing help from me. For mercy's sake, tell me how I can help you, and I think I may safely promise upon oath that would give me such pride and delight as to be of service to you?"

The girl's reception of this moment lighted up Frankie Tredethlyn's countenance like a sudden glow of summer sunshine. Maude answered for her—Maude, the fairy, the new star of success her career was gained; her father's preserver was found. She had not counted in vain upon Frankie Tredethlyn.

"I want you to lend papa twenty thousand pounds," she said; "I know that he will repay you honorably, and without interest, as soon as his difficulties in his business—but the loan of twenty thousand pounds would smooth them all away. I have told you all very, very rich, Mr. Tredethlyn, and that you can afford to lend such a sum of money, or I should never have dared—"

"You would not have dared, Miss Hillary? Oh, can you doubt that I would give the last sixpence I have in the world, the last drop of my heart's blood, to serve you even in a trifle? Twenty thousand pounds! Take forty—fifty thousand—the utmost farthing of my fortune. If you will accept it—take it into the next room, if the waste of it can give you a moment's pleasure. Oh, you don't know, you don't know how I love you!"

He had been acting Claude Melnotte, and the intensities of the scene sentimental poetry was strong upon him. Maude felt it also, supposing that he may have taken a little more splashing Mosaic in the course of his dramatic exercises than can attach to "when by a young man" in sanguine temperament. All prudence, all power of reticence had left him at this moment, and he dropped on his knees at Miss Hillary's feet, like a lover in a stage play. She was so beautiful—she seemed at that moment the only attainable in which he dared address her.

"Oh, if you know how I love you," he cried, passionately, "you could only love me! You understand! But I am so ignorant—so unworthy—so far beneath you."

Miss Hillary withdrew herself away from him with a gesture of mingled surprise and disgust.

"You dare to talk to me like this, and you are the affianced husband of my friend!" she cried.

"Oh, Mr. Tredethlyn, you take a very mean advantage of my father's difficulties and my distress."

"Yes!" answered Julia Desmond from the doorway. She had been standing on the threshold for the last few moments, watching the preface to debts upon the man who was to be my husband, and coolly ask him for the trifling loan of twenty thousand pounds." She laughed bitterly as she named the sum. "Twenty thousand pounds—and you ask your friend's lover to turn money-lender; and you bring your tears and hysterical sobs, and a thousand pretty amateur dramatic devices to bear, in order to obtain what you want, and all in the most childish innocence, of course. And then you turn upon the man whom you have lured to your feet by a hundred tricks and artifices, and make a charming show of surprise and indignation. And it is he shameful, Maude Hillary—mean, and cruel, and false; and bitter shame shall come to you for this night's work."

The Irishwoman was superb in her indignation. Those flashing eyes and glittering teeth, heretofore in the case of Julia Desmond, only lent a fierce charm to an infernal kind of splendor, such splendor had many a fatal victim seen upon the countenance of the dashing Irish colleen, perhaps no fell prone on some lonely field beside the shannon. It was against Maude that the fullest force of Julia Desmond's wrath was now given vent. Maude, of whom she had always been jealous; in whom she had continually found a triumphant rival. It was of her that she had dreamed in jealous rage that Julia turned upon her recreant lover. Francis had risen from his knees, and stood aside in sullen gloom, with his head averted, and a needless upon his face; he was sobered by Maude's indignation and Julia's passion, and he was dimly aware that he had made a fool of himself.

"As for you, Mr. Francis Tredethlyn," Miss Desmond said presently, "I suppose I have no need to tell you that all is over between us, and that I bitterly repent the humiliation my own folly has brought upon me. I should have known how empty and worthless I stooped to regard a person whose code of honor belongs to a dishonest world from that in which I have been reared. I suppose some women would be glad to sue for a man to pledge himself to one woman and then make love to another; but such is not the custom in the circles which I have been taught to consider to be welcome. I should have known what I had to expect when I came into this house. I should have known what it was I stooped to regard a man who could trusted in the truth and loyalty of a man who is not a gentleman."

Through the whole speech Julia's breath had been moving rapidly, but with unfailing purpose, though they trembled a little all the while. One by one the most damning and deadly crushed arguments that had glittered upon her head and wrists, her throat and bosom, and now the jewels lay in a little heap at the feet of Miss Hillary. Gradually One by one she had thrown them there during that passionate speech. She could not set her head out. She had to make the most of her character she had undertaken. The fiery blood of the Ryan O'Dwyan Desmond had asserted itself in spite of all the training of her lifetime, all the bitter schooling of experience. It was very dreadful to be poor and dependent. It would have been delightful to be mistress of Honsicar Deschappelles for a year; but Julia Desmond, coming to the three-fold of the study, had heard Maude's appeal for the twenty thousand pounds, and Francis Tredethlyn's impassioned avowal, and patience and policy had ebbs deserted her. Carried away by the impulse of the moment, she had committed everything. At last Francis Tredethlyn spoke for himself.

"I know that I have acted very badly," he said; "I had no right to speak; I never should have spoken but for that play. I think I must have allowed fascination of your profession in all their bitterness. But when I promised to be your true and faithful husband, I only made a promise that I am still prepared to keep. I do not think that it is just justice to remember that I did not profess any warmer feeling than admiration and esteem."

"Your gentlemanly conduct is very kind, Mr. Tredethlyn," Julia answered, coldly. "I wish you good-night."

She passed had been something terrible in the suppressed vehemence some moments before, but she was quite calm now. She swept towards the door looking as proud as a queen, but as she neared the merchant's daughter she stopped just long enough to utter one brief sentence close to the young lady's ear.

"You shall suffer for this, Miss Hillary," she said.

She left the room; but Maude followed her, crying:

"Julia! Julia!"

She hurried along the corridor and up the staircase, following closely upon Miss Desmond; but when she reached that young lady's room, the door was shut and locked in her face, and she answered the merchant's daughter she stopped just long enough to utter one brief sentence close to the young lady's ear.

"You shall suffer for this, Miss Hillary," she said.

She left the room; but Maude followed her, crying:

"Julia! Julia!"

She hurried along the corridor and up the staircase, following closely upon Miss Desmond; but when she reached that young lady's room, the door was shut and locked in her face, and she answered the merchant's daughter she stopped just long enough to utter one brief sentence close to the young lady's ear.

"I have nothing to say to you, Miss Hillary. I only regret that I must pass one more night in this house."

So Maude was obliged to go away in despair and meeting her maid at the door of her own room, was informed that Mr. Hillary had been, and gone for the night, and that the maid was told; "and I've been looking for you everywhere, miss, to know when you'd have your dress changed."

Yes, there was to be more changing of dresses before Maude's work was done. She realized her fate with a sigh for the unfortunate young person who waited upon her, and then went downstairs, gorgeous in pink silk and crape puffings, and with a crown of flowers upon her head, to receive the compliments and congratulations of her father's friends, and to act her part in that social drama which was quite as difficult a performance as the "Lady of Lyons."

Francis Tredethlyn sat quite alone in the little dimly-lighted study at the end of the long, rambling mansion, while Mr. Hillary's guests finished the evening with a little dancing, a great deal of flirting, and a perpetual ringing of bells, and ices, in consequence of the servants and lobbies, where there were hothouse flowers and low chintz-covered ottomans, and an air of loneliness and seclusion for flirtation. Francis Tredethlyn sat alone with Julia's diamonds still lying at his feet, and brooded over his position. He had outraged Maude, whom he adored. He had injured Julia, to whom he was bound by every sentiment of honor and good faith. Possibly, he may express the sentiment of his position if he sat pondering upon what he had done. "False to my own Susan, false to Julia Desmond," he thought, "and behaving but manfully as a man to me since I inherited that miserable money. I have no right to be amongst those people. I never should have come to the house where her presence has always seemed to turn my brain."

He looked down at the diamonds lying on the carpet, and smiled bitterly as he remembered how much money they represented—more than had been spent on Susan Tredethlyn in all the girl's joyless life—ten times more than would have restored the young man's father to solvency and comfort, at the time when he had pledged him the loan of two hundred pounds.

He stooped and gathered together the fallen gems. They were of the purest water, clear as crystals, and set in massive gold, some in necklaces, bracelets, and paper, and scallywags, and all necessary implements. He selected a large sheet of paper, and folded the diamonds into a parcel, and before sealing the packet, he wrote a few lines on the margin of the paper:

"I beg Miss Hillary to keep a few yet to retain the enclosed. I only were given to you as an evidence of the love which I bore you, as well as of the gratitude for your indulgent kindness to one so much beneath you as myself. I implore you to forget and forgive the folly he supported by you. I am too ignorant of the world in which you live to know what is right, and I cannot but believe you that I am ready to submit myself entirely to your discretion. I will not trouble myself further in every word I said in this room on the day when you promised to be my wife.

"Yours sincerely,

"FRANCIS TREDETHLYN."

No one but the servants saw him when he left Mr. Tredethlyn left the Cedars on that first night of the New Year; but a little before one o'clock the next day a letter was delivered to Mr. Hillary—a letter from the assistant manager of a certain bank in the city, informing the merchant that a sum of twenty thousand pounds had that morning been placed to his credit.

SHERMAN'S CAMPAIGN IN THE CAROLINAS.

Months have since swan no war like the present, in which the contending powers have been operating against as many opposing hosts, scattered over so many thousand miles of country. The extent and element of results in such varied and extended campaigns becomes rather a matter of calculation than of immediate observation. Yet there have been a few secret puzzle with Europe to understand what side had gained most in the great struggle.

The South commenced with the great advantage of having had the reins of government in its own hands for the preceding four years. It had absorbed all the surplus power or spending spirit from its more poor or able men, and had concentrated it under the sole "genius" of President and cousin no longer force slavery down the American throat. The South had also the advantage of selecting its own time for the outbreak, having arranged the successive to the plot, with the additional advantage of possessing itself of the unpaid-up munitions of public stores, all the best army officers were of Southern birth and proclivities. The energy and character exhibited by the North, however, prevented all these circumstances, and the rebellion now presents the spectacle of the United London Times to call it an "Anti-National insurrection."

In our paper of to-day we give a series of most interesting and valuable illustrations of Sherman's triumphant march from Savannah, Ga., to Goldsboro, N. C. The country, passed through in South Carolina with the tread of an invincible giant through all the long and eventful march the Union army never found a enough to oppose it, but were, on from town to town, without any more serious resistance than the destruction of a few wooden bridges, which the defeated foe, in their "Border ruffian" hatred, made—for we cannot call such ruthless cavalry, when even the rebel prints say they dreaded them more than the Yankee soldiers—for us.

Our best paper illustrates how Charleston fell, not at the approach of the victorious army, for he did not within six miles of it, but because his strategy lapped it off from the great rebel tree so though it had been a withered fruit ready to fall of its own weight. One of the first places our army reached was which is a post office of Chesterfield district, South Carolina. Here some cotton was found and a cotton press, which was speedily destroyed. Our Artist, Mr. Taylor, has given a graphic picture of this little episode in the great campaign.

Cheraw

is a post village of Chesterfield district, S. C., on the right bank of the Great Pedee river, at the head of steam navigation, 75 miles E. N. E. from Columbia. It has a bank and two leading newspapers, N. C. Gale & Co., and some importance as a depot for cotton. It contains 500 houses, and in 1860 had a population of about 1,100.

On the 3d of March, at 10 A.M., our brave boys of the 17th army corps, under command of Gen. Frank Blair, entered Cheraw, and drove the rearguard of the rebels out of it with a couple of cannon shots. As usual, the rebel troops plundered their own people when they left, well knowing they would never visit that place again.

Bennettsville

is a post village, capital of Marlboro district, South Carolina, about eight miles east from Great Pedee river by Gallo's Ferry. It contains three churches, several academies and stores. This pretty little place was occupied by our forces on the 6th of March.

Orangeburg

is the capital of Orangeburg district, South Carolina, on the left bank of North Edisto river, 14 miles S. E. from Columbia. It is connected by railroad with Columbia to Charleston, and was a place of considerable interest before the rebellion. Our Artist says: "When I reached Orangeburg it was in flames, the rebels having set fire to it as they retreated before the National forces. Most unnecessary, as it was a log of sales. The handsome churches, with their tall steeples, and about 40 houses alone escaped. A large amount of cotton was also consumed. It was a painful sight to see women and children wandering homeless and penniless among the ruins of their once comfortable homes."

Columbia,

the capital of South Carolina, is one of the most important and beautiful cities in the State. It is in Richland district, on the left or east bank of the Congaree river, immediately below the confluence of the Saluda and Broad rivers, forming it, 130 miles N. from Charleston, and 500 miles from Washington. It is charmingly situated on a plain, and regularly laid out with streets of about 100 feet wide, crossing each other with commodious lots. The greater number of dwellings are built of wood, and a few of brick. In the South Carolina College, founded and conducted some of the inhabitants would have justified the government exhibition. He says that it was set fire by some of the released Union prisoners and the contrabands who had suffered severely from their cruel treatment. The Catholic convent and the Baptist and Methodist churches would be ripe for any vengeance that might prevail. He says that the Rev. Dr. Girardeau, the rector of the institution, was much in the habit of pursuing the runaway slaves with bloodhounds, and was not scrupulous to teach the quarters three times during the night, and to use breaking out of fire in their miserable vicinity.

The Petzon Pen

It must be confessed that the Petzon Pen—of which we give a graphic sketch—has been a particular object of the extremists to which the released Union prisoners proceeded. We have no fear that the Southern Confederacy of Columbia was in the habit of pursuing the runaway slaves with bloodhounds, was not scrupulous to teach the quarters three times during the night, and to use breaking out of fire in their miserable vicinity.

Charlotte

is a thriving town, capital of Mecklenburg co., N. C., on Sugar creek, 15 deg. W. S. W. from Raleigh. It is one of the principal towns in the western portion of the State, and has been settled more than a few years past to some amount of the gold mines which have been opened in the vicinity, at the time of the breaking up of the Union. It used to possess a branch mint for the purpose of coining. It is the terminus of the Charlotte and South Carolina Railroad, and of the Central Railroad to Fayetteville. It has five churches, two newspaper offices and two banks. Its population has been long extended to Fayetteville. The population is about 3,000.

We close our illustrations for the present number with a sketch of the manner in which the enemy left Fayetteville, and a view of the Arsenal, one of the best arranged in the country, as it is to be found. We may here observe that the good sense of the reunited countrymen of the North will not tolerate passion nor crimes have of encouraging local prejudices. Let us be by corruption and by pandering to the lower political passions of the million.

Fayetteville

is a flourishing town, capital of Cumberland county, N. C. It is situated on the left bank of Cape Fear river, 60 miles S. W. from Raleigh, and 90 miles N. E. from Columbia, 120 miles north-west from Wilmington, It is the centre of an extensive trade, which is facilitated by steamboat navigation in various directions. Fayetteville contains an amount of construction just developed by the Arsenal there, who probably think that he guessed the United States would not require any more arsenals in either North or South Carolina. It has also a cotton factory, and have wrong-doers. In 1831 a large part of the town was destroyed by fire, and since that time has been rebuilt for the relief of the sufferers by the citizens of this and other States. Population in 1860 about 8,000.

Our readers will be glad to see the following graphic record of this grand campaign, taken from the New York Herald:

Never before has an army accomplished so much with such little sacrifice of life or property.

Sherman has marched about forty-five miles a day, and, as it were, from his order on Sid.

He has had no battles, nor even confirmed success. Sherman's capital movements completely split up the rebel forces, and left them into hopeless confusion and a disbanding tour power.

Our people had been somewhat retarded by the heavy rains of rain, which flooded the creeks and swamps and rivers, but Sherman's army is now within about 50 or 60 miles of rock, and build several miles of treaties work on the railroad.

Besides compelling them to evacuate Charleston, we have left Hardee's army of about forty thousand men in splinters, also over 20 miles of their chief lines of railroad, and thousands of bales of cotton.

At Columbia we captured 48 cannon, 200,000 cartridges, 5,000 rifles, and about 5,000 thousand of Confederate notes. About 10,000 muskets, over 100 Government wagons, and large quantities of ammunition, harness, commissaries, saling stock, and other stuffs of Government value, fell into the hands of the victors.

At Cheraw we took 36 cannon, eight caissons and two battle flags. Besides these we have captured a large amount stores of various kinds in the second and eleventh corps.

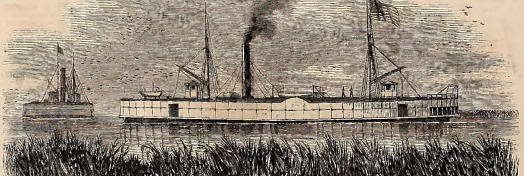
At Chesterville we took 17 cannon, besides a large amount of ammunition and stores of various kinds in the second and eleventh.

At Bennettsville we took eight, one-third of which were field piece, with carriages, caissons and all complete. We have also taken a large number in our line of battle. We gave food and transportation to about 15,000 colored refugees, besides destroying the Confederacy of colored rebels and slaves. We also had about 4,000 white refugees with us. We have left enough for corn to be sent North to whatever destination they choose.

Sherman's army is now in the following order of march: In South Carolina—Beaufort, Barnwell, Orangeburg, Lexington, Columbia, Winnsboro, Chesterville, Cheraw, Darlington, Sumter, Bamberton, Chesterfield, Mallsbury. In North Carolina—Mangum, Fayetteville, Smithfield, Linton, Robeson, Cumberland and Moore.

We marched on an average 400 miles, our wings extending some 30 or 40 miles. This would give an area of over 15,000 square miles which we opened over, at the time supporting men and animals on the country. Indeed, the foe we have subdued on the route will be content to be and still a trifling carrier of life.

Hardee's 10,000 sick, wounded and missing will cover our casualties. Several of these are owing to accidental shots, and not to the enemy's fire.



The enemy's loss must be, in killed, wounded and missing, about 15,000. While we have captured and on loss over 8,000 prisoners.

THE NEW IRONCLAD GUNBOATS, Augusta and Savannah.

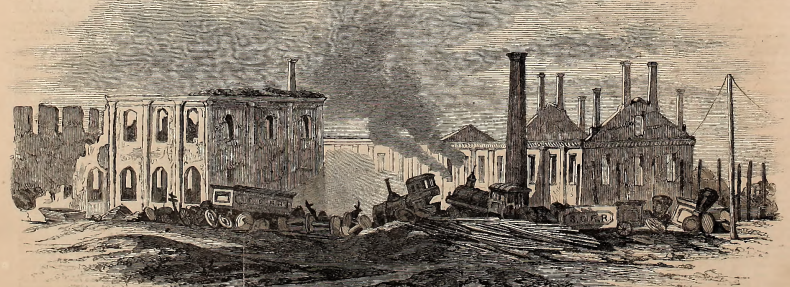
THE "double-ender" gunboats Augusta and Savannah, of which we have engraved sketches, have lately been added to the armed transport fleet in the Department of the South by Gen. Foster. They were built by Norman Ward, for special service in inland waters, and for which they are peculiarly well adapted, drawing only three feet of water, and clad with light iron, their boilers and machinery being well protected. They carry a battery of broadside, pivot and field guns, with horses and timber complete. The Augusta is the flagship, and is commanded by Ensign C. C. Nell, U. S. Navy, A. D. C. and Superintendent of Armed Transports, Department of the South. Ensign Nell is a native of Alexandria, Va., and from his long and faithful service in his present capacity, it is evident to the Commanding General of the department that no better choice could have been made.

THE NEW IRONCLAD GUNBOATS AUGUSTA AND SAVANNAH.

THE GREAT TREES OF CALIFORNIA.

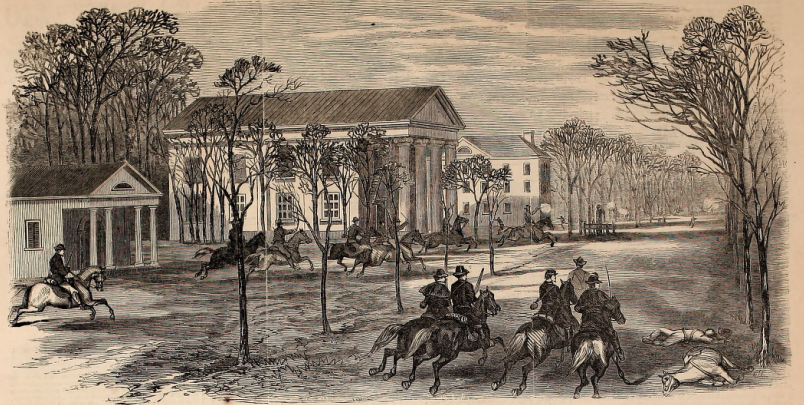
THE reprehensible regret expressed a few years ago by botanists at the destruction of the gigantic trees of California, will be alleviated by information from Prof. Brewer, of the Californian State Geological Survey. He announces the discovery of the big trees in great numbers on the western banks of the Sierra Nevada, in about latitude 36° 40 minutes or 37 degrees," and he describes them as "very abundant about a belt at 5,000-7,000 feet altitude, for a distance of more than 20 miles, sometimes in groves, at others scattered through the forests in great numbers."

One of the largest trees seen by Prof. Brewer measured 106 feet in circumference, at four feet above the ground, and was 326 feet in height. "You can have no idea," he adds, "of the grandeur they impart to the scenery, where at times a hundred trees are in sight at once, over 15 feet in diameter, their rich foliage contrasting so finely with their cinnamon-colored bark."



It is satisfactory to learn that there is no danger now of speedy extinction of the species, for "numerous seed-dealers and plant collectors, who name species more for profit than from any honest conviction that they are new species."

Photographs have been taken of some of the finest trees and groups, which make very effective and characteristic pictures.



LUCIFERS WITHOUT PHOSPHORUS.—Dr. Hierpe, a German chemist, employs for the production of the heads of lucifers a mixture of four parts to six parts chlorate of potash and two parts each of bichromate of potash and of oxide of iron or of lead, with three parts strong glue. For an igniting surface he uses a mixture of twenty parts sulphate of antimony, two to four parts bichromate of potash, four to six parts oxide of either iron, lead or manganese, two parts of glass powder, and from two to three parts strong glue or gum. These matches will ignite only on the friction surface thus prepared. Dr. H. Polter, another German chemist, uses for the match heads a mixture of chlorate of potash and a salt which he describes as a compound of hyposulphurous acid with soda, ammonia, and oxide and sub-oxide of copper. Lucifers made in this way are, however, objectionable, from the fact that they will ignite on any rough surface, even more easily than the common kind. Any good mode of rendering the use of phosphorus unnecessary would be a great advantage, as not only does it cause, in those obliged to manufacture it, a very terrible disease of the jaw, and give rise very frequently to destructive fires, but the supply of it is far from abundant, and is withdrawn permanently from the soil, to the great injury of the crops.

CURIOUS EXPERIMENTS.—A very curious regulation of the Chamberlain's office, bearing date 1824, touching conduct to be observed by cadets who were invited to dine with an Austrian archduke, runs as follows: "His Imperial and Royal Highness having deigned to invite several officers to dine at his table, and having had frequent opportunities of observing that a considerable part of those officers behave with the strictest courtesy and good-breeding towards each other, and generally conduct themselves like true and worthy cavaliers, nevertheless deems it advisable that the less experienced cadets should have their attention directed to the following code of regulations: 1. To present their respects to his Imperial and Royal Highness on their arrival, to come neatly dressed, coat and boots, and not to enter the room in a half-drunken condition. 2. At table they are not to tilt up their chairs or rock themselves therein, nor stretch their legs at full length. 3. Nor drink after each mouthful, for if they do they will get tipsy too soon; nor empty the goblet to the extent of more than one-half after each dish, and before drinking therefrom, they should wipe the mouth and moustache in a cleanly manner. 4. Neither are they to thrust their hands into the dishes, nor to throw the bones under the table. 5. Nor to lick their fingers, nor to expectorate in their plates, nor to wipe their nose on the tablecloth. 6. Nor shall so brutally as to fall from their chairs and make themselves incapable of walking straight." We may well wonder what kind of manners prevailed at that period among the lower grades of society, when we find a code like the above considered necessary in the conduct of young officers, who must have belonged to the noblest families.

A LECTURER was dilating upon the powers of the magnet, defying any one to show or name anything surpassing its power. A hearer demurred, and instanced a young lady, who used to attract him 13 miles every Sunday.

BUFFALO-FIGHTING IN BURMAH.

THE buffaloes are owned by different districts and townships, and each one is an object of attraction and interest to those who have chosen it for their champion. They sit around the huge animal for hours, smoking, chatting, and arguing on its capabilities and disposition. They cut for it the freshest grass, and lead it by a cord passed through its nose to the salt mud in which it delights to wallow, and to the cooling stream, where it may often be seen nearly immersed, its broad black nose only raised above the water. At last the hour looked for day arrives. On a properly laid out spot, a number of sheds, made of bamboo and thatch, the floors of which are raised several feet from the ground, are erected. All these are crammed with spectators, and thousands more occupy the enclosed space. At length a movement in a certain direction is perceived, cymbals, and drums announce the arrival of the first buffalo, which forthwith makes its appearance in great state. First of all come a crowd of nearly naked men, dancing, shouting, and cutting the most grotesque antics. Next walks the buffalo, under a canopy, and surrounded by a white cord, held out by some of its supporters. A man leads it by a cord passed through its nose, and it is thus paraded round the ground. In a little while another movement is visible, and the excitement becomes more intense. Another buffalo is seen in the distance, slowly wending its way to the scene of conflict. He soon arrives on the field, and is led towards his antagonist. The flags which have been held before the eyes of either animal are now removed, and each is mounted by a Burman, who retains his seat on the animal's back as long as possible, at the imminent risk of being precipitated on the horns, or trampled under the feet, of the contending and enraged buffaloes. No sooner do the animals catch sight of each other than they rush furiously to the combat, and the clash of their massive foreheads may be heard at some distance. And now the excitement of the people is at its height; the mass of human beings sways to and fro and closes around the buffaloes. Pecns, with long bamboos, beat back the crowd. Men interested in the victory of their champion buffalo urge him on in every possible manner. The fray seldom lasts longer than a few minutes, when one of the animals suddenly comes to the conclusion that discretion is the better part of valor, and remembering no doubt, the maxim of Hudibras rushes from the field through the midst of the spectators, while the antagonist follows at his heels. Then they go amid the shouts and laughter of the people, who generally bring them to a stand at a great or less distance from the original scene of conflict, when a more furious and lasting fight often ensues, at which the tables are sometimes turned.

the fugitive becoming in its turn the conqueror. Various bets are made on the issue of the contest, and as soon as it is decided the victorious party reappear on the ground, yelling, shouting, dancing, making the most frantic gestures, rolling in the mud—their dishevelled hair all the while streaming in the wind. Men, boys, and women join in a wild dance, and, lastly, the victorious buffalo is paraded around the ground by his partisans. He is decked out with flowers, caressed, and, in one instance, I observed a man kiss the huge brute on the forehead several times with great gusto. After a short interval, another pair of buffaloes arrive on the field, when a similar scene takes place. In some cases, one of the animals, being imbued, it would appear, with "peace-at-any-price" principles, altogether refuses the combat, and bolts from the ground, to the great disgust of its friends and patrons. The great sport continues for two days, during which time eight pairs of buffaloes are brought into the field; but the town continues in a state of excitement for some time, and the victorious buffaloes are paraded through the streets, decked out in various ways, and accompanied by a number of the winning party, all dressed in holiday attire. The young men, clad only in silk pul-sos, and gold chains about their necks, dance, whenever the procession stops, to the musical instruments by which it is accompanied.

Recently some persons engaged in making turpentine in Plumas county, California, tapped some pine trees of a species new to them. The fluid flowed abundantly, but it had a peculiar odor, and when taken to the turpentine stills in the neighborhood nothing could be done with it. At last it fell into the hands of a man who managed to distil a liquid, which proved to be a new discovery. Instead of the disagreeable odor of turpentine it has a fragrance like citron, and is free from all resinous matter. Ten gallons of it weighs as much as six and three-quarter gallons of pure water. It dissolves all the animal and vegetable oils, and leaves no stain of its own, nor does it affect any of the colors used in dyeing, and thus it is an excellent substitute for benzine, without the odor which makes the latter substance so offensive. It is also much cheaper than benzine. The new liquid is called "erasine," because of its value for cleansing. It evaporates rapidly, and burns well, but is more expensive than coal oil. This novel product of California is now in market.

We would call special attention to B. T. Hayward's advertisement, in another department of this issue. Our gallant troops in the Union service can obtain from him every desirable style of Company, Regimental, Brigade, Division or Corps Pins, Badges or Emblems. As every patriot prides himself on his particular Company, Regiment or Corps, and wishes to decorate his manly breast with an honourable Badge, designating his connections, and thousands, not knowing how to obtain them, we take pleasure in referring them to Mr. Hayward's advertisement, in which will be found all that is desired in that line. Mr. Hayward is one of our largest and oldest Manufacturing Jewellers, and is the leading manufacturer of the Army Badges. In fact, his is the only reliable house to deal with. He can be relied upon for quality of goods, promptness and faithfulness in filling all orders. Our "Masonic" friends will also find everything in their line appertaining to masonry.—Army and Home Journal.

CASTLES IN THE AIR!

BY MRS. GORE.

"Mrs. Gore writes with a crystal crayon, and sprinkles her characters with diamond sand. She is simply the most rattling, dashing, sparkling fairy that frolics over the mystic field of papyrus. If one who follows the freaks of Wrottesley Wrottesley, Esq., from the beginning to the end of his 'Castles in the Air,' be not convinced of this, then there is no salt in wit nor fascination in sentiment."—Douglas Jerrold's Weekly.

Dr. Talbot's Concentrated Medical

is a PREVENTIVE of SICKNESS. The experience that Dr. Talbot has had for the last Twenty-five years convinces him that it is time the public had an article offered that will prevent sickness. The article offered is Dr. Talbot's Medicated Pineapple Cider, designed for all classes, old and young. It is not new to the Doctor, but is entirely new to the public. One quart bottle will last a well person one year. This is rather a new mode of doctoring; nevertheless it will save millions from being sick. Is it not better to pay three dollars a year to keep from being sick, than to pay ten or twenty dollars in doctor's bills, and as much more for the loss of time and the inconvenience of being sick? To prevent sickness, use as follows: Add one teaspoonful of Medicated Pineapple Cider to a tumbler of cold water, and drink the first thing after you rise in the morning, and the same before you retire at night. It will increase the strength and give vigor and action to the system. A celebrated New York merchant, who has made a thorough trial of the Pineapple Cider, assures Dr. Talbot that he gained ten pounds of flesh in one month at the first trial. He continues its use as above directed, and finds it very beneficial; says it has proved an entire preventive to sickness in his case. Also, another well-known gentleman in New York has used the Medicated Cider constantly for ten years, and has not been sick one day during that time.

Price $3 per bottle (full quart); pints, $2; half-pints, $1. One quart bottle, two pint bottles, or four half-pint bottles, sent free by Express on receipt of price. All orders should be addressed to

What the "Press" say of Us.

GREAT GIFT DISTRIBUTION.—A new opportunity is offered for obtaining watches, chains, diamond rings, silverware, etc., by Messrs. Arcadia & Co., of No. 208 Broadway, who advertise a large assortment of articles, to be sold for one dollar each. The variety is value, and the manner of sale is novel. The advertisers offer to any person to take a certificate of gift for 25 cents, which entitles him on receipt of the article named in it to pay four dollars more on the delivery of the article, which will be worth more than that amount, and may be $50 or $100. An illustrated catalogue is published, a dollar accompanied it.—New York City, Feb. 19, 1865.

MESSRS. ARCADIA & CO. have long been a perennially known to us, and we believe them to be every way worthy the confidence of the public.—New York Saturday Press, Sept. 24, 1864.

We have inspected, at the office of Arcadia & Co.'s agency for Europe and Manufacturing Jewellery, a large assortment of fashionable and valuable articles of gold and silver plate, and understand that the whole of the articles advertised by this house are to be disposed of on a novel principle, differing entirely from the ordinary lottery and other schemes for the enjoyment of wealth. We know that the firm in question is a very respectable and thoroughly worthy one of public confidence, and recommend its readers to call at the establishment.—New York Atlas, Sept. 3, 1864.

MESSRS. ARCADIA & CO.'S arrangement, the advantages must be on the side of the customer, for in no case is anything to be paid until the purchaser has seen what he will get for his dollar before-hand, and he receives not one article he is not satisfied with.—New York Leader, Aug. 6, 1864.

EXPLOITATION EXTRAORDINARY.—The most eligible position in Broadway, for the establishment of a depot for the sale of reliable articles at the "Great Gift Distribution" is at 208 Broadway, where Messrs. Arcadia & Co. are in very successful operation in this way, and only within the last week. Their system of selling articles at one dollar when each article can be seen, is certainly the most liberal and commendable we have yet noticed, and can also be strongly suggested.—New York Sunday Mercury, Aug. 14, 1864.

We have examined the articles in the advertisement of Arcadia & Co.'s Gift Distribution of watches, jewelry, silverware, etc., and find them to be of the most unexceptionable character, the jewelry always being of the best quality, and the watches of the best quality, they are exceedingly fair operations.—The Troy Democrat Newsletter, Aug. 11, 1864.

The Revised Map of America, for 1865, 1870, Nov. 25, 1861, one or our lady subscribers became an agent for our publication, and in a few days sent in a list of articles, sent as prizes for her agency, to the value of Seventy Dollars. Without the slightest desire to vouch for each and all of the articles were worth twice the amount paid for the map, and we therefore deem them an extra.

ARRANDALE & CO., Manufacturers' Agents,
No. 167 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
Announce that all the above list of goods will be sold for one dollar each.

In consequence of the great stagnation of trade in the manufacturing districts, caused by the blockade of the harbors east of the supply of cotton, a large quantity of watches, jewelry, and silverware, which was on the way to this country, has been sent out for sale in this country, and is now offered at one dollar each, as per list.

Parties ordering Certificates, ARRANDALE & CO. will act as Agents for the purchase of Manufactures, subject to the following regulations:

Upon receipt of the money, we will forward the certificates sealed up and mixed, and when opened, each one will be found to represent some article on the list, the choice is a surprise.

Upon receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you are to have, and then it is at your option to send us the money for the article or not, as you may prefer. All articles will be sent by express, and the charges will be at the rate of Five Cents for Each Package.

Send 25 Cents for Certificate.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying Postage and other incidental expenses, 25 cents each, and no certificate for the certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; fifty for $10; one hundred for $18.

AGENTS—We want Agents in every neighborhood, and in every town and county in the country, and those acting as such will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered for them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage Stamps.

ARRANDALE & CO.,
167 Broadway, New York.

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1866, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 498—Vol. XX.] NEW YORK, APRIL 15, 1865. [Price 10 Cents. $4 00 Yearly. 13 Weeks $1 00.

Southern Inhumanity.

Mr. Sumner, in his celebrated speech in the United States Senate, on "The Barbarism of Slavery," faintly indicated the extent of that barbarism. The war has shown us its desperate and fiendish character. We doubt if any contest in history has been so full of horrors as that of the great civil war of the past four years. Excesses, we are prepared to admit, have not been wholly confined to one side. We can readily comprehend how blood has been visited with blood, and how the outraged loyalist in East Virginia and Missouri has taken a stern vengeance on those who desolated his home without rational cause, and who can alledge no grievance to justify that appeal to arms, which is the last resort to oppressed humanity, and which calls on God to render judgment. But of wanton, needless murder, of robbery, imprisonment and starvation, of wild, savage barbarity, we believe the records of war furnish no parallel to those which have been practiced in the Southern States, on men and women whose only crime was their devotion to what the rebel Vice-President declared to be, even while his lips were black with treason, "the best Government the world ever saw." Apart from all individual cases of outrage and suffering, the great fact that more than one-third of our soldiers have died in Southern prisons, most of them mere pens, in which there was neither food, shelter, or medicine, and where the decencies which civilization affords to the lowest animals were denied them—this fact alone illustrates "the barbarism of slavery," far more than Mr. Sumner's rhetoric, far more than the multitudinous facts of a different character, that he adduced in support of his position.

Within the past three months we have received from Southern prison-pens more than 30,000 of our soldiers, in exchange for an equal number of rebels. Of this number not one in a hundred is able to enter the ranks again, while every returned rebel soldier is better able to shoulder his musket than when the fortunes of war placed him in our hands. The exchange—the policy of which we by no means wish to controvert—has given to the South 30,000 effective (perhaps discouraged and by no means enthusiastic) men, and has returned to us an equal number of worn, haggard, starved, diseased Union soldiers—not only unfit for the field, but in most instances incapable of efficient exertion in any department of industry for the remainder of their lives. But they have been rescued, as one of them writes strongly, but reverently, "out of the jaws of hell." Their lives, above all things precious, still remain to them, and the renovations of good food, and the moral reinforcement of kind words, friendship, and sympathy may yet restore them to society if not to the armies of the nation.

We could fill volumes, if we were able to recite the revolting details, with records of rebel barbarity; how the huts were burned over the heads of our sick officers and soldiers in the prison-pens of Columbia, on the approach of Sherman, and how the cowardly retreating soldiery of Wade Hampton fired on the unarmed prisoners, when they found they could not resist the advance of the "Yankee hordes." A correspondent in Wilmington tells us, that when the National forces, under Terry, approached that city, there were then a considerable number of Union prisoners who had been brought down for exchange. Many were in such condition, so reduced and exhausted, that they could not be removed. Ten of these, in the hubbub of the evacuation, crawled into a dilapidated outbuilding for shelter, but a party of Longstreet's men discovered them, hung three, and setting fire to the huts burned the rest alive. A chaplain in the army, who has ministered to the wrecks of men who have been returned to us from Salisbury, writes:

"I stood in the sick-ward, and listened to the recital of these men, and what they had undergone, and looked upon their wasted forms, and could fully indorse the story of a regular, who had served 13 years in the army, and been taken captive by the Indians, from whom he received better treatment than from the rebels; who said he had been in the keeping of devils and not men, while a prisoner at Salisbury. He told me he had not washed for seven months, as it was impossible to get even water enough to drink. Most of the men whom I saw seemed to be in a wandering state of mind. One officer, that morning, jumped from the window and was killed."

And yet the men who have been guilty of these outrages complain, "in the name of humanity," against the execution of criminals convicted of having attempted to throw a railway train with its hundreds of passengers, men, women and children, from the track, and of having essayed to burn down a dozen hotels and the most popular and crowded place of public amusement in the metropolis, as "a murderous act!" If it be true that time brings its compensation, Southern traitors have a terrible reckoning yet in store. The wretched ruins of Charleston, and the still glowing embers of Columbia, the capitol of the sinful State of South Carolina, its wasted plantations and its proud mansions given up to the slave, poorly meet the severe requirements of that unrelenting Nemesis which computes its revenges not alone from what the black man has suffered, but from what the barbarism of slavery has inflicted on the white man.

A FRIEND writing from the Glen House says: "As soon as our party arrived, I went to engage horses for the ascent next morning. Every horse fit for duty was engaged. Two of their best had just been led in, useless, and the ostler assured me that it would be impossible to bring out one of the sick ones fit for duty next morning. After taking a look at them, I went to my trunk and brought out my big bottle of DAVIS'S PAIN KILLER, gave the ostler a fee and directions for drenching and rubbing, and the next night we rode back from the summit—three of the six horses all in condition to do duty next day. So much for the Pain Killer."

How About Husbands?

SOME of our daily contemporaries are distressing themselves with the fact that there is a predominance of women in the population of several of our Eastern States. Gov. Andrew, of Mass., in his late message, stated that there were 40,000 more women than men in the "old Bay State." An "able journalist" has found in this announcement sufficient material for a startling leader, and it affords him ample ground for speculations on the increase of suits for breach of promise of marriage, and an explanation, in English latitudes, of that pleasant, popular and peculiarly British pastime of wife-murder. We are consoled with the observation that it may be "some time" (if any one can tell how long that is likely to be), before "the disproportion between the sexes in America will settle into so positive and pressing an evil as it has become in Great Britain." One cause of the real or assumed disproportion of the sexes is attributed (our contemporary alluded to, is, of course, "copperhead"), to the "depletion of men by the existing war." And we are called on to contemplate, with the disgust that every American must feel, the spectacle of "women toiling with the hoe and spade in the fields of Germany and France," and to transfer this same spectacle to the banks of the Connecticut, the Hudson and the Mississippi. And all this, not because the thing is likely to happen, but because it suits the purpose of "copperheadism," which, no longer able to croak about anything else, now wishes to unsettle the feminine nerves of the nation. We are quite willing to echo the wholesome admonition wherewith our contemporary winds up his homily, namely, that "our women may as well prepare themselves to play a sterner and less ornamental part in the general economy than has heretofore been their lot," but we do not believe they will be compelled to do so because of the circumstance that husbands, or those who might be such, have become so much the scarcer in consequence of the war, nor because wife-murder has become an "institution" or a "privilege," or what not, among the brutish colliers of England.

If there be a preponderance of women in New England, there is also a preponderance of men in the Western States. The census of 1860 gave us a total of upwards of 700,000 more males than females in the United States, and we are not prepared to believe that the disproportion has been reduced within the past four years. In that period far more males have come into the country than females, and it cannot be pretended that the devastation in the armies has overcome the difference so authentically defined by the census. Let every Jill console herself with the reflection that, despite the war, Fate has reserved for her a Jack. If he comes to her somewhat disabled in his locomotive apparatus, and his countenance a trifle disfigured by a scar, we believe he will be none the less loved by the true American woman, and we know he will be all the more respected. To him and to her will be reserved the glory of handing down to their children a title of honor not less glorious than has descended to those whose fathers fought at Bunker Hill, Saratoga and Yorktown.

A CORRESPONDENT takes us to task for what he calls the "undue severity" of our remarks in last week's issue, on the subject of what are called railway "accidents." He thinks we are encouraging Lynch Law, "a thing greatly to be dreaded." His mistake consists in this proposition—namely, that there is a responsibility attaching to our railways that can be reached. We assert that there is not, through any known regular process, and consequently that the extraordinary appliances by which mankind vindicates itself and its rights must be called in requisition. The wholesale railway murder that been going on for the past four months must be stopped, if it costs a revolution. Voila tout!

Our correspondent says: "Railway accidents generally arise from three or four direct causes, which we think may all be traced to one indirect cause. There is either some insufficiency in the rolling stock or permanent way; the signals are bad or are out of order; the employees of the company are inefficient or overworked; a greater amount of traffic is undertaken than can be conveniently and safely performed; or trains are badly timed and punctuality is not sufficiently attended to. These are ordinarily the direct causes to which most accidents can be traced. And it needs little reflection to perceive that the indirect cause of all these is parsimony on the part of directors; and that, consequently, the directors and their traffic managers are the parties really to blame when a railway catastrophe occurs. Upon them, then, and not upon underpaid and overtasked signalmen, engine-drivers and conductors should the consequences be visited. If a few railway directors and traffic managers were prosecuted, and, on conviction of having caused an accident by starving the working of the line, were subjected to imprisonment or penal servitude, according to the degree of their culpability, more would be done, we believe, to check the occurrence of railway casualties than the killing of any number even of congressmen. The greed of dividends is the real source of the mischief, and those who pander to that greed should be made to bear the punishment. It is in vain to punish the neglect, or incompetence, or confusion of mind of signalmen, engine-drivers and porters, who are made to toil from 12 to 16 hours out of the 24 for wages of from eight to ten dollars a week, and let their superiors escape whose conduct is the true cause of accidents by underpaying their servants and keeping the lines and machinery in an inefficient state. The law as it stands, could it be enforced, would be strong enough to prevent all preventable accidents, which includes the greater number of those which occur. It only requires to be enforced in a determined way and against the right parties; and the duty of seeing that this is done rests with our public legal functionaries, and, in a secondary degree, with the public themselves. Let each one of the travelling public do his duty in this respect; let there be no glozing over of faults and making of things pleasant for parties in high authority on our railways; let punishment be visited where blame really rests, and we feel assured that railway travelling will speedily become a much safer thing than it is at present."

IT has been for some time known that the Government was in possession of authentic information of the most important character, as to the real condition of the rebellion, derived from official sources. The Tribune has just given a portion of this information to the public. From it we learn that on the 4th of February the entire available forces of the Confederacy were as follows:

Lee's army	64,000
Bragg, including Hoke's division	9,000
Beauregard and Hardee	22,000
Dick Taylor, D. H. Hill and Howell Cobb	7,000
West of Mississippi	50,000
Total	152,000

The 22,000 under Beauregard and Hardee includes the late army of Hood, and all the forces which evacuated Savannah and Charleston. The 9,000 of Bragg include all the garrison of Wilmington. Hood's army, when it entered Tennessee, numbered 47,000 men, and was reduced to 17,500 in the conflicts with Thomas. From the 1st of October, 1864, to February 4, 1865, 72,000 men had deserted from the Confederate armies east of the Mississippi. During Price's recent invasion of Missouri nearly all the Missourians in his army deserted, and he lost during the campaign 19,500 men. The most significant part of the information alluded to is the following official report of the examination of Gen. Lee by a Committee of the rebel Senate, on the 24th of January:

Questions by Senator Hunter—What is your opinion as to evacuating Richmond, and withdrawing the army to North Carolina?

Answer—In my opinion, it would be a bad movement. The Virginia troops would not go to North Carolina; they would go home.

Question—Do you think we have troops enough for the next campaign?

Answer—I do not. We cannot last till midsummer.

Question—What do you think of the policy of arming two hundred thousand negroes?

Answer—If we are to carry on the war, that is the least of evils; but in such an event the negroes must have their liberty.

Question—Do you think we could succeed by putting the negroes into the field?

Answer—That would depend on circumstances. We could at least carry on the war for another year.

Question by Senator Hill—What is the sentiment of the army in relation to peace?

Answer—It is almost unanimous for peace. The men will fight longer if necessary; but they believe we cannot continue the war through another campaign.

Question by Senator Graham—What is your individual opinion on the subject of peace?

Answer—I think the best policy is to make peace on the plan proposed by Mr. Stephens. The people and the country ought to be saved further sacrifices.

Question by Senator Walker—If peace be not made before spring, will you consent to take command of the armies of the Confederacy, with unlimited powers?

Answer—I will take any position to which my country assigns me, and do the best I can; but I do not think I can save the cause now. No human power can save it. Had I been assigned such a place one year ago, I think I could have made our condition better than it now is.

Question by Senator Orr—You think, then, General, that the best solution of our difficulties is to make peace on the Stephens plan?

Answer—Yes, that is the best policy now. I think the army and the people ought to be saved if all else is lost.

The plan proposed by Mr. Stephens was as follows:

First—Let President Lincoln issue an address to the army and people of the South, embodying in that address what he he has before said as to peace, and also what passed at his interview with the Commissioners.

Second—Agree to appoint Commissioners on the part of the United States to meet State Commissioners on the part of such States as desire to meet at Nashville, Louisville or Cincinnati, in April or May, to consult as to a peace, on the basis of such States returning to the Union upon the sole condition of obedience to the constitution and laws of the republic.

Third—An election by such States as shall send Commissioners to that convention, of Senators and Representatives to the Congress of the United States, to enter such Congress upon equal terms with other members of it, and such States to have equality on the floor of Congress with other States.

Mr. Stephens believed this plan would secure the approbation of North Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, and perhaps of South Carolina and Virginia. He was quite sure it would command the assent of at least six States.

THE person called Maximilian, "Emperor of Mexico," is in trouble. Napoleon has placed him on the imperial bed, but the literary French Emperor cannot make it a bed of roses. It seems that the Austrian duke has been compelled to carry out virtually the same policy as the republican Juarez, and although the creature and creation of the church party, he has already declared against its policy. The result is that his holiness has written Maximilian an admonitory letter, and there is a very pretty quarrel as it stands.

The real history of Macbeth, or rather all that history tells of him, and consequently all that Shakespeare had to work upon, may be summed up in a few words. In the year 1034 the Scottish monarchy came to a pause upon the overthrow of Malcolm by a Norwegian chief, who subdued a great part of the country, especially the northern and eastern portions. The rest of the people raised up a king in the person of Duncan, whose mother was the daughter of Malcolm. He advanced against the Norwegian in his absence, and was slain by Macbeth, the Maormar of Moray, who in turn overran the land, and was made king. Subsequently the English invaded the country, led by Siward, Earl of Northumberland, and the adventurous Macbeth fell on the field of battle. Such are the simple incidents upon which this masterpiece of Shakespeare is founded. All the supernatural portion of the drama, as developed by the witches, the character of Lady Macbeth, who is in fact the leading figure, the murder of Duncan in cold blood, and the duel, are the poet's own creations; it can scarcely be called an historical drama, for in no other play purporting to be founded upon historical facts has Shakespeare wandered more from the line of history.

LOUIS NAPOLEON, in his letter to Gen. Forey, commanding the French expedition to Mexico, defined the principal object of his expedition there to be "to oppose to the too great expansion of the Anglo-Saxon race in the New World an insurmountable barrier by restoring to the Latin race in Mexico its force and prestige." On this the Chicago Tribune pertinently inquires whether the 7,000,000 Indians, mulattoes and mestizoes, who constitute seven-eighths of the Mexican people, are representatives of "the Latin race;" and also whether the population from the United States, composed of "whipped and runaway rebels, with some enterprising and fortune-hunting Yankees from California and the North," with which ex-Senator Gwin, under the patronage of the French Emperor, proposes to fill up the Northern Mexican provinces, are just the kind of material best fitted to protect "the Latin race in Mexico," from the encroaching spirit of the American Anglo-Saxons?

AN officer belonging to a Massachusetts regiment stationed at Charleston writes:

"The suffering and desolation of Charleston is indescribable. If you could see what the proud people are reduced to, you could not help pitying them somewhat. The best people among them are entirely penniless; they look like the poor and talk like the poor. They are degraded and demoralised beyond measure. It is the most thoroughly forsaken looking place you can imagine. It reminds me when I go through the streets of some old doomed city whereon 'the wrath of God' eternally rests."

THE popular condemnation of the conduct and condition of Mr. Vice-President Johnson, on the day of his inauguration, has not been confined to the press, but has found expression in the action of the popular branch of the Wisconsin Legislature, which a few days ago passed a series of resolutions setting forth that whereas, on that occasion, Mr. Johnson was in a state of gross intoxication, violating all the proprieties of that solemn and impressive ceremonial as well as the moral sense of the country, and thereby rendered himself unworthy of the distinguished honor bestowed upon him, and unfit for the actual and possible trusts committed to his care, therefore,

"Resolved, That while we appreciate the past distinguished patriotism and courage with which he resisted the rebellion and defended the integrity of the Union, it is the sense of the Wisconsin Legislature that his offense is so flagrant, disgracing the Government in the presence of other Christian nations, he ought at once to resign his office as Vice-President of the United States, thereby allowing the United States Senate to elect some member of that body to preside over its deliberations, whose moral character will comport with the dignity of the position he now disgraces, and that in case of the death of the President the country may not be more deeply humiliated and endangered by the inauguration of an intemperate executive."

The Governor of the State, by a separate resolution, is directed to communicate this expression of the sentiments of the Legislature to the Vice-President.

THE Boston Transcript (no mean authority) tells us in a recent review of a volume of Emerson's Poems, that "there are single lines which are worth bales of ordinary verse; and, in respect to vital imagination, the volume is unequalled by that of any other American poet."

LIBERTY to exercise the faculties being the first condition of life, and the extension of that liberty to the furthest point possible, being the condition of the highest life possible, it follows that the liberty of each, limited only by the like liberty of all, is the condition of complete life as applied to mankind at large.

STATESMEN are commonly considered great in proportion to their possession of the gift of foresight, but what statesman could have dreamed, when Thomas Sims was carried down State street, Boston, as a fugitive slave, that in March, 1865, he would be in Huntsville, Ala., recruiting colored troops for the State of Massachusetts? This is the fact, but the man who ventured to predict it four years ago would have been considered a candidate for the insane asylum.

Summary of the War.

VIRGINIA.

ON Wednesday, the 29th of March, Gen. Grant opened his new, and we trust his last campaign, against Petersburg and Richmond, by Sheridan's advance towards the Southside Railroad.

The 2d and 5th corps had the infantry advance, and got into a fight the same day at Gravelly Run. Thursday they kept pressing up the Boydton road. Friday there was constant fighting. Saturday was the day of the contest which proved decisive at Five Forks, a point at the junction of the Boydton road, with the road crossing it from the north and intersecting with the Quaker road along Gravelly Run. When that was once carried, the advance of our columns was thenceforth rapid.

Sheridan was sent out on the straight road to Dinwiddie Court House, as if he meant to strike the Southside road as far west as Birkesville. But it now appears that he had a different purpose. Having enticed away a considerable body of the enemy for the defence of the most distant point he menaced, Sheridan turned suddenly eastward again, and is heard of by the last dispatch as within three miles of Petersburg, and co-operating directly with the forces which surrounded Petersburg, and which having crossed and destroyed the Southside railroad, reached up to the Appomattox. Sheridan's operations resulted of themselves in the capture of no less than three brigades of rebel infantry, several batteries, and prisoners uncounted.

On the 2d the most general engagement of the five days which have elapsed since Grant started, took place. The attack was along the whole line, and along the whole line there was the same splendid success. The force which Lee sent to look after Sheridan has been left out of the fight, and Sheridan having closed up towards Petersburg has reunited with Warren and Parke, and Wright, and there is a junction of the whole line in a semicircle about Petersburg. Wright, who held about the centre of the line is upon the Southside road and tearing it up.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Sherman has returned to Goldsboro from his visit to Gen. Grant at City Point, and is about to move on his advance towards Weldon.

The advance of Gen. Stoneman's cavalry force, which recently moved from Knoxville, Tenn., and which the rebels have reported as designed to strike at Lynchburg, Va., entered and captured the town of Boone, North Carolina, on the 27th March, after routing the rebels stationed there and inflicting on them a loss of 10 killed and over 60 wounded. Boone is the county town of Watauga county, in the north-western part of North Carolina, and is 200 miles from Raleigh, in a direction a little north of west. The rebel papers report that Stoneman's command consists of about 6,000 cavalry, and that he is accompanied by the 4th corps of national infantry, under Gen. Stanley, numbering at least 15,000 men.

ALABAMA.

A dispatch in rebel newspapers from Montgomery, Alabama, says a Yankee raiding column, estimated at 2,500, principally infantry, struck the railroad 20 miles below that place on last Monday morning, the 27th March, captured two trains, and then moved on down towards Greenville. Great alarm was caused by this Yankee apparition, and Gov. Watt had called on the people to organise for resistance.

Petersburg Evacuated, and Richmond Ours.

THIS is the graphic and most significant dispatch which we stop the press to insert—news that makes this the brightest Monday that ever dawned, and excites the country as one man with joy and pride.

WAR DEPARTMENT.
WASHINGTON, D. C., April 3.—10 A. M.

MAJOR-GEN. DIX:

It appears from a dispatch of Gen. Weitzel, just received by this Department, that our forces under his command are in Richmond! having taken it at 8.15 this morning.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

At the same time we receive a dispatch from President Lincoln, stating that Petersburg is evacuated and Grant pushing on to cut off the retreat of Lee. New York city is wild with enthusiasm. An immense meeting of citizens has assembled by one consent in front of the Custom-house, and is at this moment being addressed by Hon. L. E. Chittenden, late Registrar of the Treasury. The people are half frantic, and the Doxology, in full chorus, tempered with plenty of drinking, expresses the gratitude and triumph in every heart. A large mass meeting will assemble to-night in Union Square.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE comment of the English press on the inaugural of President Lincoln is, in general, favorable. Even the Times finds something to praise both in the inaugural and in the past policy of the President. The Army and Navy Gazette is of opinion that the end of the war is drawing near, and this opinion seems gradually to obtain among the rebel sympathisers in England, although the Index assures them, that if Lee retreats to the mountains of Northern Georgia and Southern Tennessee, he can prolong the war for, at least, 20 years.

The Memorial Diplomatique, which is regarded as a semi-official organ of Mexico, pretends to know that the United States will soon recognise the Imperial Government.

It is reported that France encourages the annexation of the Duchies of Schleswig-Holstein to Prussia; that Austria will consent to it if in return the German Confederation will guarantee to her the possession of Venetia, but that Russia opposes it. England demands that the rights of the Diets of the two Duchies and the rights of the Federal Diet of Germany be respected.

NEW BOOKS, MUSIC, &c.

FROM F. A. Brady, No. 22 Ann street, we have received "The Marrying Man," an amusing light romance, by the author of "The Jilt," "The Henpecked Husband," "The Flirt," etc.

"GEN. GRANT'S RICHMOND MARCH" is a timely composition, in easy yet showy music, for the piano. It is embellished with a very handsome cover, representing Gen. Grant and staff. The music is calculated for popularity.

We have also received a lively Schottisch, by H. C. Watson, called the "Petroleum Court Dance," which seems to us a capital lubricator for graceful and willing feet. It is dedicated to the ladies of the United States by the New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore Petroleum and Mining Company.

Among the new music that is sure to please, we notice a series by Oliver Ditson, of Boston, called "Songs of the War," the subjects being patriotic, martial or pathetic.

TOWN GOSSIP.

THE crocus is springing. There is a race of flowers that disappear when the violet and hepatica open in the woods. Certain blossoms that have got into dissipated habits by their contact with society, give up their lives for spite and disgust as the rugged children of the forest stand out and blow their purple fingers before the world in the gales of March. There is that expansive and irregular young belle, the camilla; she will lift her waxen bust from a snow-bank of swansdown, all through the long false day dispensed by the chandeliers, and pretend that the life is suiting her. Pretty lady, why are your lips so pale? Only fancy a flower that never heard of a bee, and whose conception of summer is a pipe full of hot steam!

On the same principle there is a sort of warblers whose song dies away as the wood-thrush and robin come swimming up the south-wind. They exist in concert-halls and academies of music; here their artless twittering and plaintive descant sound all night long, shaking the vitreous dew-drops that hang from candelabra-branches. In one sense they are better than the songsters of the groves; as thus: if you will wait till we get a good hold of the idea, you shall have it for nothing in all its penetrative sagacity. Now for it.

Supposing the emotions of people in society to be of a slightly factitious or morbid cast, it is evident that these high-strung feelers must be in need of something a little better than natural song when they pay for their music. Every fashionable person believes himself at heart a melancholy and blasé wight, for whom life has lost all its sensation; why this secret melancholy is acknowleged, and even made much of as a fashionable sentiment, you must get a preacher to explain. At any rate we may easily suppose that a brilliant coquette, returning home at dawn after a night-long saturnalia, would feel a jar in listening to the note of a wood-robin in the Park, hailing sunrise with its exquisite matin. Why should the silly creature offset its little natural fund of simple gratitude and heart-laughter against the tired and languid and guilty thoughts of a beautiful woman? Gottschalk is better; his emotion is the refined and poisoned emotion of civilization and the century; he expresses our burden of ennui (the prettiest euphemism yet discovered for conscience), and thus the trouble is half assuaged; for it is one of the laws of our being that a sorrow once communicated loses half its pain. The tenderness of Gottschalk is just sufficiently suffused with the morbidness of the time to be acceptable to our self-dissatisfied XIX-cento hearts. So let us enjoy as we may those puissant evanishing hands, just touching and going—pale possessed sisters, charged with all sorts of melancholy prophecy, yet sweet as the Lorelei. We are having the last of him—he is flying, flying South, as the other birds of passage come northward; the swallow's wing meets the faultless swallow-tails; the golden oriole encounters that silver aureole they laid upon his head the other night, and directly we shall have nothing better than the cheap and countrified music of the birds.

Don't you enjoy watching a figurante? When she bends slowly far over sideways, and you momentarily expect to hear her vertebræ crack, isn't it nice? When she steps down to the footlights on two rigid prongs, with an expensive and perfectly natural smile on her features, how you long to invite her home to share with you the last chapter of "Armadale." That favorite elbow of hers, the rectangular, making a square of her two arms as she clasps her hands—how much could be learned from it in the way of grace by the Venus of Medici, who only flexes one arm, or by the Venus of Milo, who is perfectly happy and beautiful without any arms at all!

But we saw the other morning another style of figurante. She was putting up, for the time, at Goupil's, and they all called her l'Almée. She had a foreign air, and she painted heavily.

In fact it is the last picture of Gérome's we are speaking of. Now we thank our planets we know nothing of art, technically. We enjoy of all things getting behind a rural neighbor at an exhibition, and putting out over his shoulder such critical terms as we have chanced to pick up. "Ah, what texture!" you know; "What breadth, in yonder Don Quixotte!" "What transparency about that millstone or ladder!" "Ah, the glazing over this eye of a dead sheep!" "What color in that group of negroes!" and "What harmony and tone in yonder little study of the Kilkenny cats!" It is very pleasant, and we have often ourself performed the part of the rural for some connoisseur, who was willing to appear to public advantage in a studio. But once, thinking ourself safe, we said, in the presence of a great authority, that a view of Dover Cliffs was rather chalky, and it seems it was fruity all the while; and the deep dog never let on until we had further committed ourself by saying a Falstaff was solid! Then he assured us that it was thinner than shadows, and as flat as a man's nose when it is driven into the pavement and sat on; and having flattened us effectually, he left, and afterwards called us "Chalkey Stolid" in an article.

The Almeh holds her feet still, and her tongue too—excellent things in woman. Her lower limbs are lost in many a fold of cachemir, heavy yet flexible. Her ornaments are coarse and opulent, and from the drift of her hair, all tangled with coins, she looks back upon a group of janizaries and enslaves them. All the air is hushed and dim; through a doorway you see a blazing street of Cairo. The spectators watch her with brutal satisfaction; her attendants swing away at their music with joyless monotone; her own high-boned cheek is shining with exertion, and the gauzes have blown away from her heaving olive-skinned torso, while her tinted fingers clasp the shells together as she writhes before the men. While the artiste are sighing with despair, and the moralists are doubting and enjoying, we may be allowed to say of this picture that it brings to us the very core and inmost heart of the East, that no traveller telling his story, or poet singing of Cleopatra, can so infuse us with the clammy richness of the Orient as this thirty-inch bit of panel, with its sensitive film of paint. It is the enchanted rug of Sheherazade, that floats us without the exertion of travel into the very palace-chambers of the sun.

We have seen a letter of thanks, signed by George H. Stuart and other officials of the Christian Commission, addressed to Messrs. E. and H. T. Anthony, on account of their most liberal and patriotic offer to devote a large proportion of the profits of their daily retail sales—(no less than 25 per cent.)—to the relief of our sick and wounded soldiers, by the hands of that Commission. During the fortnight commencing April 3d, these popular dealers in stereoscopic pictures and cartes of every sort will fill orders sent by mail, or scatter across their groaning counters the wealth of pictorial matter they have accumulated. We should think the public would be glad to assist in this charity. The feminines especially, who find it so easy to manufacture a want, ought to discover in themselves some immortal Tantalus-thirst for albums and photographs of every description, when they learn that so large a share of their gifts will find the sad hearts and aching limbs of the suffering patriots. Remember, ladies—make some cabalistic note upon those delicate pearl tablets, and stream in your pretty spring bonnets to Anthony's, 501 Broadway, and there be lavish in a way that your husbands and flinty papas will for once approve.

The mysterious and darkly-inspired Heller appears to have persuaded the angel whom he still has served to let him continue his mysterious Gyges for one week more. We all love to be frightened—and no Christmas ghost-story is so nice as the actual disappearance of a solid avoirdupois live man from our sight into the uneasy privileges of the Invisible. Meantime Heller winks that awful wink of his, and promises something more outrageous next week—what is he at, do you suppose? How shall we all feel when the little prompter's bell shall ring with peculiar meaning on the opening night of the new wonder? Hear it not, Duncan, for it is a kneller, that summons thee to—heaven or to Heller. They say the man is actually going to shut up a fellow in a mail-bag full of ghosts—probably dead letters. Let us all be on hand to prevent any outrage by this dangerous wizard.

The theatres are running without any change of importance. "Corporal Cartouche," at the Winter Garden, after just enough of a newspaper squabble to make him exciting, is now receiving his friends at nightly soirees, and interesting everybody by his jaunty yet sincere and noble manners. The principal actor, Mr. Henry Placide, as well as the efficient stock company, has won golden opinions from some of the most intelligent critics of the press.

On Monday evening the stalwart veteran of the stage, Mr. Forrest, succeeded Miss Western on the boards of Niblo's, opening with one of his very finest impersonations, "Richelieu." There is always about Mr. Forrest's more temperate passages a noble aplomb and dignity that no other American actor possesses. His glorious organ-voice is enough of itself to charm a whole sackful of ears, and his stalwart figure befits some Roman and other muscular parts that no slighter actor could succeed in.

In our allusion to Gottschalk we should have mentioned his last great fantasia from "Faust," performed upon six pianos (Chickering's, of course), in company with five of the very best performers that could be found. The grand musical storm evoked from these superb instruments gives equal testimony to the talent of the performer and the fine quality of the pianofortes.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The Niagara, on her trip to her present location, made 17 knots in one hour, under topsails alone, at a point on the English coast.

—— Gov. Bramlette, of Ky., according to the Louisville Journal, furnished all his slaves with free papers on the 17th ult.

—— John Overton, the Tennessee millionaire, who gave $5,000,000 to aid the rebellion, has deserted the cause, taken the oath, and is once more a peaceable citizen of Nashville.

—— "In God we Trust" is to be the motto on all future coins of the republic.

—— It is stated that Major-Gen. Robert Anderson has been directed by the President to raise the Stars and Stripes on the battlements of Fort Sumter on the 13th of April, 1865, the fourth anniversary of the day he consented to evacuate the place.

—— "A Runaway's Wife" memorializes the Ohio Legislature in favor of an amendment to the bill punishing runaways from the draft, providing that their wives shall be entitled to a divorce forthwith upon application.

—— Not a few wealthy Southerners have made a provision for themselves and families in England and France. While the ports were only blockaded they sent cargoes of cotton, which was sold at high prices, and the proceeds lodged in the Bank of England or safely invested.

—— It is said that Sherman has captured enough cotton, turpentine, pitch and rosin, to pay the expenses of his campaign.

—— Mr. Garrison, of the Liberator, has concluded to discontinue that journal at the close of the present year, which will complete the present volume. It seems to him historically fitting that the Liberator should simply cover the whole period of the struggle against slavery, and should terminate with its extinction.

—— A letter in the Pittsburg Commercial says that the loss of property on Oil creek, up the Alleghany river and at Oil City, will amount, without doubt, to $2,000,000.

—— It is estimated that two square miles of the city of Rochester were under water during the recent flood. It is thought that the city was damaged to the amount of $2,000,000.

—— The Cleveland Plaindealer, the only daily Democratic paper in Northern Ohio, has suspended publication.

—— On the special tax upon incomes, California pays over $1,000,000.

—— The Wisconsin Indians, who have just received their annuities, call the fractional paper currency "papoose money." This is on the same principle that a pistol is called a "son of a gun."

—— The Secretary of the rebel Treasury informs holders of coin that he will purchase it outright, paying for it in cotton at 15 cents a pound, or take a quarter of it without payment, in the shape of taxation. The holders will probably decline both the loan and the tax.

—— The Illinois Legislature has appropriated $25,000 to purchase the burial-place of the late Stephen A. Douglas.

—— There are now only two hotels in Richmond—Spottswood and American. There were half a dozen before the war.

—— A fair held by school-girls at Brooklyn Heights, N. Y., recently, realised 1,000 dollars for the benefit of the soldiers.

—— The rebel papers urge their readers to write cheerful letters to their friends in the army. Even a Mark Tapley couldn't do it.

—— The press, type, files and material of the Charleston Mercury establishment were burned at Columbia, having reached that point in charge of the pressman, on their way to a locality out of reach of the Yankees, when Gen. Sherman entered the place. The cars in which they were stored are said to have also contained the private and official correspondence of Hon. R. B. Rhett, from the commencement of the war, with a large amount of money, notes, bonds and other valuable papers, all of which were destroyed.

—— Postmaster-General Dennison has invited proposals for conveying the mails, by means of a monthly line of first-class American sea-going steamships, between San Francisco and ports in the Chinese Empire, touching at the Sandwich Islands and Japan. The act of Congress provided that no bid shall be considered amounting to more than $500,000 for 12 round trips per annum, nor unless the same is from a citizen or citizens of the United States.

—— An average of $350 a day is now paid to rebel deserters for the muskets they bring in.

—— President Lincoln was some time ago addressed by a committee of the Sanitary Commission Employment Bureau, the office of which is at 35 Chambers street, in this city, requesting that he would instruct the various heads of governmental departments to bestow upon disabled soldiers such offices as they might be found qualified to fill, in preference to all other applicants. To this the President has responded that the patriotic purpose of the commission in this matter meets his hearty approval and concurrence, and that he will call the attention of the departmental chiefs to the suggestions contained in the address. Admiral Paulding, commandment of the Brooklyn Navy Yard, has already set a good example in this respect, he having announced his intention of bestowing on veteran and disabled soldiers and sailors all positions in his gift for which they may prove competent.

Personal.—Paul Morphy, the chess champion, is practising law in New Orleans.

—— The many friends and admirers of Signora Whiting Lorini will be pained to hear that she died of a severe hemorrhage on the night of the 25th Feb., at Santiago de Cuba.

—— The Roman Government has applied to Mr. W. Story, the American sculptor, for leave to send, at its own cost, to the Dublin exhibition, the colossal figure of Saul.

—— The Russian that little Patti is going to marry has an income of $1,800,000 a year.

—— In a suit for damages for imprisonment and persecution at the hands of certain prominent rebels of Knoxville, during the early days of the rebellion, Parson Brownlow has been awarded the sum of $25,000, to be raised from the properties of the notorious J. C. Ramsey, Sneed, and some others.

—— The Washington correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette writes: "I beg pardon for referring to John Stuart Mill as one of Gurowski's friends. 'Vriend,' exclaimed the old count, a moment ago, while his one eye glared ferociously on me, 'Vriend—bah! I am no man's vriend!' (The which I solemnly vouch for.) 'Vriend! I abuse my best vriend to-morrow, if I dink he deserve it! Vriend!—I don't know vat vriendship is. Do you dake me for a voman?'"

—— John Frederick Hartranft, the gallant General who recaptured Fort Steadman, and turned defeat into victory on the morning of the 25th, is a native of Montgomery county, Penn., and was born December 16, 1830. He was graduated at Union College, Schenectady, in 1853, and was in the practice of law till the commencement of the war. He has fought in North Carolina, Virginia, Pennsylvania, Tennessee and Mississippi, and always with marked distinction.

Obituary.—Mrs. J. D. Wood, the actress, who was lately badly burned at the Buffalo theatre, while trying to save a little girl from destruction, died on the 18th of March.

—— Chas. A. Burt, the well-known and wealthy brewer at Albany, was instantly killed on the 22d March, by the accidental falling of a stone from the top of his brewery.

—— Col. Alanson Knox, formerly one of the most prominent citizens in Hampden, Mass., died recently, at the age of 81 years, at Chagrin Falls, Ohio, where he had been practicing law for many years.

—— Mr. Jacob Little, for a quarter of a century the principal operator on the New York Stock Exchange, died on the 26th of March. He was born in Newburyport, Mass., about 1807. He entered the office of Jacob Barker, then the most eminent banker of the city, and remained with him until 1823, about which time he began business on his own account, and in 1825 was admitted to the Stock Board. For 30 years the life of Jacob Little was the history of the Stock Exchange. For the last five years he has taken a less prominent part in the movements of Wall street. The magnitude of modern speculations seemed to astound and bewilder him, and withdrawing from the arena where he had been so long the acknowledged chief, he looked on with astonishment—dismay even—for with prophetic vision he could see the ruinous end. Mr. Little's life, long eventful and stirring, was illustrated by great purity of character, and indomitable energy of purpose. His kindness and liberality to those in misfortune have grown into a proverb.

Accidents and Offences.—On the 19th March, while Mrs. Breen, of Waterbury, Conn., was getting ready to go to church, her dress took fire, and she was so badly burned that she died shortly afterwards.

—— Silas W. Kepton, a brave young officer, one of the first of our men to get into Fort Fisher, was lost overboard a few days ago from the Santiago de Cuba.

—— On the 31st March the U. S. steam transport Gen. Lyon, from Wilmington to Fortress Monroe, conveying nearly 600 passengers, took fire off Cape Hatteras, and it is feared that over 500 perished. It was occasioned by a light coming in contact with a barrel of kerosine.

Art, Science and Literature.—The Cerneau, a newspaper published at Port Louis, Mauritius, contains the following extraordinary announcement, according to Galignani: "M. Chambay has succeeded in fixing the colors of the object. The picture is taken instantaneously, as in other kinds of photography. The modelling and relief are marvellous—the blood appears to circulate beneath the skin, the color is fixed, and the portraits, which present a surprising resemblance, are equal to the finest pastels, miniature or water-color drawings. Monsieur Chambay is about to remove to Paris."

—— The sun is 1,400,000 times larger than the earth, and weighs 700 times more than all the planets, planetoids, comets and satellites together.

—— A new Magazine, called the Traveller, is to be brought out soon in London, under the editorship of Mr. Sala and Capt. Burton.

—— Advices from Melbourne, Australia, dated Jan. 26, says: "A fine comet is visible in the southwest. It is supposed to be that of 1853, predicted by Herschel as returnable in 21¾ years."

—— In the year 1864 there were published in London, according to the Literary Gazette, 3,553 new works and new editions, including pamphlets. Of these there were of religions, 715; biography and history, 233; geography, topography and books of travel, 151; fiction, including juvenile works, 812; poetry and general literature, 565; annuals and new serials, 166; law and parliamentary, 79; medical and surgical, 124; European and classical philology, including translations, 132; English philology and education, 177; naval, military and engineering, 52; politics and questions of the day, 56; agriculture, horticulture and field sports, 46; art, architecture, etc., 52; commercial, 41; science and natural history, 122.

Foreign.—It is stated that Prince Napoleon is about to write the "History of the Bonaparte Family." With this object he has already engaged the services of M. Ruperti to make the necessary historical researches. It is believed the intended journey of the Prince to Italy is connected with the proposed work.

—— One hundred and one thousand establishments in Paris employ 416,000 workmen. The classification of these establishments shows that 20,930 are devoted to feeding Paris, 5,378 to building Paris, 23,800 to clothing Paris, and 7,391 to furnishing Paris.

—— It appears from an official return that there are at present 2,382 religious houses in Italy, of which 1,506 are for men and 876 for women. The number of persons in these houses is 28,991, of whom 14,807 are men, and 14,184 women. The Mendicant order includes 8,229 persons, comprised in this total.

—— The London Spectator calls Louis Napoleon the "only free man among 30,000,000 Frenchmen."

—— A new gunpowder is said to have been discovered in Germany. It consists of tannic gallic acid, or the resin of commerce, and chlorate or nitrate of potash.

—— The American skater, Jackson Haines, at St. Petersburg, gave an exhibition of his prowess on the 24th Feb., which drew him in 1,500 roubles. One of his most daring feats is to lean backwards while skating backwards, till his hair touches the ice, and then, without help, recover a perpendicular position.

—— The debt of Canada, with less than 3,000,000 of people, is almost as great as was our public debt before the war, with over 30,000,000; and the debt of all the British Provinces, with a total population of a little over 3,500,000, is actually greater than was our debt with 32,000,000 of people in 1863, even after the profligate administration of Buchanan.

—— Some of the churches in England have been provided with pews for deaf people. These pews are connected with the pulpit by means of tubes, which have trumpet-shaped mouths in convenient positions for the ears of the listeners.

—— A case has been tried in England, which turned upon the question whether the word "team" meant a wagon and horses, or the horses only. It was decided to mean the latter, and the Duke of Marlborough, who was the plaintiff, lost the suit.

—— France has had 67 queens. Miserable lives they led. Eleven were divorced. Two executed. Nine died young. Seven were widowed early. Three cruelly treated. Three exiled. The rest were either poisoned or broken-hearted.

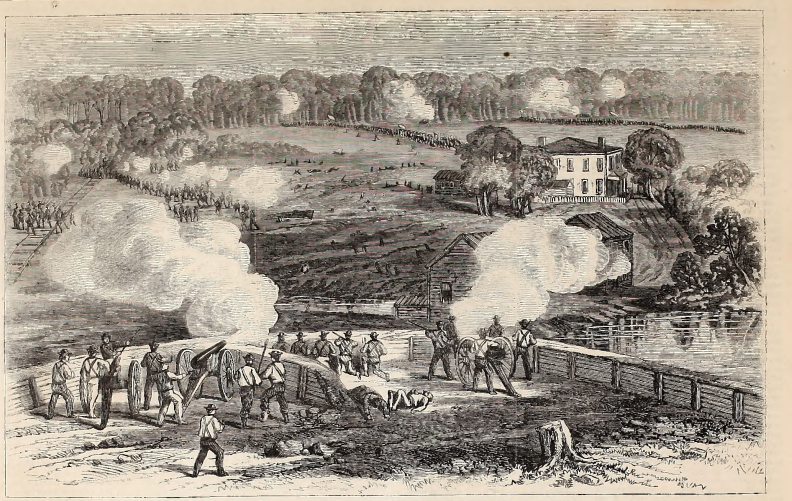
—— The word "husband" is Anglo-Saxon, and signifies the "bond of the house," or family "house bond," as by him the family is formed, united and bound together.

—— The eruptions of Vesuvius and Etna are likely to be followed by an outbreak of Stromboli. Letters from Sicily announce that symptoms of activity in that volcano have appeared, as already columns of smoke, furrowed with streaks of light, rise above it.

Chit-Chat.—The Richmond Enquirer thinks it will be shown that God is fighting on the Southern side, "although with his visor down."

—— The amount of absynthe drank in Paris, with fatal effect on intellect and nerves, is hardly to be calculated. Switzerland alone sent last year 7,500,000 gallons.

—— Nothing teaches patience like a garden. You may go around and watch the opening bud from day to day, but it takes its own time, and you cannot urge it on faster than it will. If forced, it is only torn in pieces. All the best results of a garden, like those of life, are slowly but regularly progressive.



—— An able physiologist has written that one-fifth of the human body is composed of phosphorus. Punch remarks that this most likely accounts for the number of matches made.

—— Gold fish are now offered for sale in the markets! Another indication of the speedy resumption of specie payments.

THE RIVER.

BY W. H. ROBERTS.

TELL me, O you well loved gentle river,
Why so mournful is your song?
Find you not the trees as dear as ever
That have shaded you so long?

Lo! in vain the fairest flowers are stooping
To you from the bank above,
And your own sweet fern is sadly drooping
For the olden kiss of love.

"Not for fern, or sweetest flow'rs that springing
Bloom upon the fragrant earth,
Can I change, alas! my mournful singing
For a lighter song of mirth.

"Listen! I have drowned a maiden fairer,
Than I ever hope to tell,
Only to herself can I compare her,
She was passing beautiful.

"What was I? She left the flowers that love her,
Though they drooped as she passed by,
Left she, too, the trembling leaves above her
I could hear them vainly sigh.

"What was I? I saw her coming nearer,
Choosing me before the rest—
Fool was I! I thought that I was dearer,
And I drew her to my breast.

"Vain the thought, I was not one to woo her,
But her murderer instead.
Am I cold? A shivering ran through her,
Then a silence. She is dead."

Tell me, river, hush your dreary sighing,
Tell me, did the maiden fair
Wear a flower, a rosebud lightly lying,
Half concealed in golden hair?

"When, alas! I drowned her with my kisses,
Half concealed her hair beneath,
Lay a rosebud in her golden tresses,
Not so fragrant as her breath."

Take me, too, O sadly flowing river,
Take me also to your breast,
Join me, join me to my love forever,
Let me share her perfect rest!

TOUCHED!

BY C. SHACKELFORD.

IF I were intending to write an essay on "Fools," my own life would afford the greater portion of the material; for I am no perfect a sample of those unfortunates that the mere publication of my likeness would form an excellent and reliable digest of a comprehensive work. Yet the misfortunes that have befallen me and given rise to epithets that placed me in the category of the unwise are not owing to a want of intellect, but to an unkind fate that has persecuted me throughout my life and embittered it by happenings that have grievously affected my nature. The little episode in my life which I wish to narrate may act as a warning to those who are as thoughtless as I used to be; and, at the same time, I am confident it will exculpate me from the charge made by my friends in a half serious, half humorous manner, that I am the greatest fool that ever walked. I disclaim all such superiority; I refuse the honor of being numbered among kings, than whom, in ages not yet fairly quiet in their graves, the fool was wiser than his master. I am simply a plain, unpretending, middle-aged man, knowing a good deal of all kinds of life, good and bad, who has a little story to tell, even though it be to his own disadvantage. Even among my intimate friends it is not generally known—if it was known at all—that my father was a shoemaker. They only remember him as the proprietor of a large wholesale and retail shoe-store, as a man of honor and unblemished reputation for honesty and virtue in his business and private life, and that he died worth one hundred thousand dollars.

I am known as the only son of this man. Cordwainer though he was, his life had a romance woven in with its thread of days, and to him the woof was golden, vitalized happiness dimmed only by Death, who stopped the shuttle of Fate and sent the weaver about other business. I remember very distinctly my father's little shop, that had always such a pungent smell of leather and wax, and where he worked with awl and thread until my young eyes wearied with the watching of the tireless hands and my ears were deafened with the rattling stroke of the hammer upon the lapstone. He worked from early morning until far into the night, and his labors gave him such prosperity that it was not many years before he left the old shop, with its dirty walls, and opened a store for the sale of boots and shoes.

His sign was no longer "W. Lacis, Boot and Shoemaker," but "Wallace Lacis, Boots and Shoes." He had cleansed his hand from the wax, and gone for ever from the leather-seated bench. Yet I remember that he preserved, in an upper room of the great store in which in his later years he sold, ready made, shoes, a leather-seated bench, with its appurtenances of awls, knives, wax, thread, bristles, pegs, hammers, strap and cobblestone! Yes! every implement of his old trade was there treasured, even to the dirty and ungainly candlestand, with the bits of candle that had not been lighted for many years—not since, with a great sigh of relief, he had driven home the last peg and drawn the last stitch in the shoe that was the "finis" to his book of hard but earnest toilings at his trade. Thereafter his hands would find other work to do, for by their unceasing labors he had acquired such a sum of money as would enable him to journey in a more pleasant and profitable path of life. This good father of mine cared nothing for himself, but held his wife and child as dearer than aught else on earth, and it was for their happiness that he labored and triumphed. In these memorials of a past life—a life of frugal toil—he felt a great and proper pride. They were rungs in the ladder of fortune up which he had slowly and painfully climbed, and showed the marks of resting and of weariness. He never boasted of his success in life, never vaunted his indomitable energy of purpose that made him a rich yet honest man.

I loved and respected this father, and in this sort of feeling I have found that I was different from most young men, who think kindly of their parents only when their own pockets are empty and need to be filled with money. I thought him the greatest and noblest of men, and he used to ever teach me firm and proper principles of action. More than once when I have come home from college he has kindly and wisely sought to inculcate the truths acquired by his own experience.

"Honest industry, my son, no matter how menial, is a bypath to the highway of fortune. Consider circumstances, whether good or bad, as human beings; then, whatever be your occupation, you can strengthen or weaken such creations as you think best. But I am trying to do the work for you, George; for I know how it ought to be done."

He said this to me not a month before his death. I was the only one left to my father—wife and daughters were dead. There was no reserve on his part to chill my affections. We were companions, laughing and talking together like two boys, each the confidant of the other. For myself, I can never speak too often or with too much praise of this father. My tribute is to the dead. While he lived he was honored and respected, even though his education had been meagre, and when he died he was sincerely mourned by those who could not know him without knowing his worth.

At college I was an idler; my lessons were learned under compulsion. My leisure hours were mostly devoted to boating and horses. I read novels that gave me false views of life, coloring the unknown, as often the bad as the good, with such hues of glorious beauty, that the world, called society, seemed a Paradise on earth. The impressions produced upon me by such fictions were kaleidoscopic. I truthfully realized only my actual surroundings. My nature was confiding; I was impulsive. My experience was not yet such as to make me calculating, uncharitable and suspicious. There were conditions of the mind that had been neglected both by my father and my tutors. Judging from the books I read, I thought the age one of chivalry. Was I not a fool?

When I was in my twenty-second year, and within a few months of the termination of my college life, my dear father died, and left me with the fortune I have already mentioned. I was at home during his illness, and alone with him when he died. With his death my troubles commenced. Hitherto no cares had oppressed me; now every difficulty grew gigantic. My fortune was my misery. He had been dead only a few hours when I overheard two old women, who were engaged in arraying him for the grave, discuss my marital prospects.

"Yes," said one of them, snuffling and speaking in a dry, shrill voice, "he is a splendid young man. They do say he's worth thousands—more than we can count, Missus Gurty! And there's Miss Outter! She's worth thousands and rides in her carriage. They orter jine their money, hadn't they?"

"That they orter," assented the other.

Then followed a silence of three or four minutes, broken at last by the harsh voice of the first speaker:

"Who would have thought!" she soliloquized. "Long years agone this poor dead man used to mend my shoes. I was an old woman then. Here's his corpse stretched out, and I a tendin' on't. I tell ye, Mrs. Gurty, money don't keep death away."

"Don't I know it? I'm a good fifteen years older than he. I've slaved all my life, and have gnawed crusts more than once. But he was a good man—not a bit proud with all his money. Do you remember his wife, that died nigh onto twenty years ago? Never a nicer woman lived."

"Don't I know it? She married agin the consent of her family, and they'd have nothing to do with her after that. Mr. George is like both of them. He's his mother's face and his father's heart."

"The woman that gets him 'll have a good husband; and there'll be lots of women fishin' for him."

The door opened, and I saw Mrs. Gurty slowly descend the stairs. More than once in succeeding months I remembered the last words that I heard in that room from those old women. Unconsciously they had recited the proem to much of my future misery. I did not return to college, but, in compliance with my father's request, I took into partnership his head clerk, James Butlin, who took charge of the business, though I was in the office a great deal of the time.

My fortune, although not exceedingly great, gave me much trouble. I gradually discovered that the women were glad to know me because I was rich and with a prosperous business. I went very often into what was called society—a phase of social existence that exhibits pictures of very foolish men and women who are unmarried. Speaking entomologically, I became a beetle among butterflies. I have suffered for my temerity in venturing alone into labyrinths of charms that acted like a spring-gun eventually, if one were not lucky enough to retrace his steps. I am writing of my own experience. Girls and old ladies tending towards embonpoint and sixty, and with waiting daughters, have been stumbling-blocks to my movements in society; or, like smiling colossi, they have ruthlessly trampled upon my most delicate ambitions. At parties they have hummed around me like mosquitos. They designedly encountered me in my walks and drives, and bowed and smiled upon me at the theatre and opera. Not a day passed but that languishing eyes drooped as I looked into them; and I was talked to very enchantingly by mouths with pretty coral lips that were starving for kisses—a fortune for each kiss—mouths that would not have spoken to me three months before my father's death. Incidents combined to make me suspicious of all women. One lady would warn me insinuatingly against the diplomacy of others, who, in turn, did likewise. It is not surprising that I became wary of the other sex. I know a woman's power of fascination, even if the charmer be disliked.

To crown all the suspicions that were rendering me unhappy, I received a letter from my mother's brother, in words very similar to the following:

"You are my nephew! Let me give you a word of good advice, for I learn that you have become wealthy, and one in such a condition as to be profitably plucked. Beware of designing women! Most women are successful intriguers. I am a married man, fifty years old, and tell you this truth. You were a nobody; but your fortune makes you a somebody. You will not be cared for unless you can be used for some purpose. You will find it beneficial to yourself and property to be ever on your guard.

"I'd like to have you come down here and visit me. My daughters will try to entertain you—and perhaps marry you. Of course I mean that one of them will make you her husband if possible. At any rate, try and make me a visit."

I could not help laughing at the effrontery of this uncle. He was a man—wealthy, I had heard—who would hold no communication with his sister because she had married a shoemaker, and who offered no sympathy for the loss of my father; a man of whom I knew nothing, for whom I cared nothing. I became quite angry over his contemptible letter. He had warned me against women; and written a sort of admonition against his daughters. I had casually heard of this uncle from my father, but I had never seen him or his daughters, and did not want to see them.

I decided not to accept the invitation, and not to reply to such a heartless epistle.

Did I say that my existence was miserable? It was Plutonic. It was my nature to admire and love, in a feeble sort of a way, every woman having good looks and good sense. It was necessary that I should have an idol in the temple of my heart. I had had my father as an object upon which to bestow my affection, and did not then bitterly yearn for loving sympathy, kind words, and the eloquent sparkling of a woman's eye. His death had made an "aching void" in my heart. Yet as soon as I sought to lessen the pain by seeking the society of a girl, who was sensible and good looking, just as as soon did women, old and young, begin to warn me against each other by hints and broad assertions as to the demerits of each and all. I did not seek a wife, for I was not yet wearied of single blessedness; but whenever I sought the society of one more agreeable to me than her companions, I had the experience of others given to me that I might note her physical and intellectual defects. I would have been contented if people would only have let me alone. That was impossible. I was like public property. Money had made me a shuttlecock in the hands of fate: and the battledores were wielded by the skillful hands of women, old and young. One would tell me one thing; another would warn me against something else—until my brain became so confused, my nature so falsely suspicious of everybody, and my heart was so inappeasably famished for a real true friend, whether man or woman—that life, as I was living it, became unbearable.

I confess all these truths that you may understand the nature and cause of my feelings towards women, as well as the reasons I had for leaving the city and my business, in the earlier days of summer, and going to an obscure "resort" at the sea-side.

Bodlinn was a quiet, lazy kind of a village, that just suited the tastes of sedate men, who wanted to indulge in midsummer reveries and read their papers, of their wives who wanted to sleep during the hours of sultriness, and that did not suit their daughters who wanted to exhibit their dresses and their faces, and with one or both to win an admirer or a husband. It was a torpid beauty, except in the early morning and cool evening when visitors and villagers straggled picturesquely, by twos, and threes, and fives, down to the beach to dip in the surf made glorious by the rays of the rising or the setting sun. It was a beautiful village. Its houses were scattered, some in the village with its murmuring brook; others nestling snugly against the verdant hills that looked down upon the bay and, beyond that, upon the broad ocean, and the passing specks of white-canvassed vessels that glided over its sparkling surface. The craggy cliffs, plumed with cedars, cast cool shadows in which a boat might lie, and the rower put by his oars and soothingly rise and fall with the undulations of the waters.

I, an unpoetical sort of a fellow, soon became subservient to the dreamy influences of the place, and instead of living a life where sensations came to me, I began to think. I often rowed my boat out into the shadows of the cliffs, and then let it float out of the shadow into the light, while I was lost in pleasant reveries; or I climbed into a certain niche in the cliffs, where the sunlight filtered through the leaves of overhanging trees, and was a throned king in the realm of imagination until night dissolved the spell of witchery and forced me back again to the hotel. In those days and hours of solitude—for I knew only a few people—the little information I had acquired at college proved a great relief. There was not much poetry in my nature; but such a meditative existence developed the strength of what I did possess.

There was enduring pleasure in what little association I had with others. Such society vitalised my experience and developed traits of character in myself that I never thought I possessed. To me there was no monotony in this quiet sort of life. I did as I pleased. I never tired of the pictures I saw of young and healthful humanity and contented old age. There were operas of musical laughter—cavatinas of women's voices.

Pretty girls with all colors of eyes and of hair, and shapes of mouth and beauty of form, gaily splashed in the gleaming water, and mingled their cheery voices with the profound monotone of the sea.

When the sun was fairly risen, and we had become wearied with the pleasure of our aquatic amusements we separated, to pass the day in sleeping, driving, walking, talking, and a few in loving.

It was a very agreeable manner of life. There was little to do, and plenty of time in which to do it. I will be candid and confess that I flirted (I think that is the name by which such pleasant occupations are called), with Miss Crawford, until, one day, I overheard her ask her mother a question that startled me, and made me careful to be frigidly polite thereafter.

"Ma" (she always spoke the word with a broad accent.) "Ma, how much do you think Mr. Lacie is worth?"

"How should I know, Kitty. Pa, says he's rich. You like him, don't you, dear? Isn't he quite attentive to you?"

"Yes, ma!"

Then followed words much lower in tone. I was sitting, or rather lying, behind a sheaf of lilac bushes, and the night was very hot. I arose and noiselessly moved away, thinking of the chicanery of these husband-hunters, and how very often money makes hideousness sweetly palatable. However, I did not apply that last thought to myself. If I had only had a sister to advise me, I should have been saved much anxiety. I do not and never did think that all women are mercenary, and all the while I was shunning the charms of the daughters of needy men, I was really searching, almost hopelessly, for a woman whom I could purely love, and who would love me for myself. I was very lonely.

I had admired Miss Crawford. I do not think I could ever have loved her. Her remarks, this night, made me suspicious of herself and wary of the rest of her sex. But these torments of the mind suddenly and pleasantly disappeared, through the agency of another who was, unconsciously, the curse of my life.

Within a week after the happening of the incident just mentioned there came to Bodlinn a young lady whom I no sooner saw than I loved, My passion was one of those inexplicable happenings of life that no one pretends to understand. They are without reason, and as quick, in their operations, as the glance of an eye that sends a message to the heart. One loves because he has eyes and ears and uses them. To see and hear is to feel the strange and subtle potency of a new emotion—an emotion denominated love. As I was neither blind nor deaf to the appearance and attractions of the newcomer, I followed out the demands of my nature and the laws of my creation, and loved this woman just as soon as she alighted from the stage.

Of course I cannot describe her. Very few men can give a clear and vivid description of the women they love; and I am but an inferior artist. Yet I think I might give a just criticism of a statue or a painting, for my heart would not be so pleasantly influenced as it was by its newly-throned queen. I know she was not beautiful, if she were to be measured to find if the length of her nose was so many inches, and the forehead so many inches high, all computations being according to the standard revealed in the statues of ancient Greece. I do know that she was of medium height, and had a form that was the embodiment of grace; and that her black eyes had a sparkling, resistless way of looking at any one. The glances of those eyes lighted the lamp of love on the altar of my heart. I am afraid the flames spread; for I felt that I was being consumed by the suddenly kindled fires of a holy passion.

I did not know her name, nor was it known to any of my acquaintances. Is this a convincing proof that I am a fool? Pray accept it as such! My only plea in defence is, that I was powerless.

She did not live at the hotel; but boarded at a little cottage on one of the hills. It was at its gate that I saw her descend from the stage-coach.

People will gossip about ladies who are reserved in their society; and so some of the busy-bodies of the village had a story—many of them, in truth—ready for this case—for the lady lived in a very retired manner. And they guessed that she was a widow, and a rich woman, and a poor woman, and a woman disappointed in love, and so on through a category of imaginary good and evil fortunes.

I ascertained that the spectacled, frigid, middle-aged lady accompanying her was her mother, and felt assured that there could be no foundation for evil reports about the daughter. In the coolest hours of the morning I used to see my unknown going to the beach, sometimes with a book in her hand—very often carelessly swinging her hat. Seeing, I came to worship her.

This sudden and trustful adoration of a woman that one loves is, I am told, one of the idiosyncrasies of human nature. I was in love with this woman of twenty or twenty-one years of age before I knew her name. I never thought of her as being an adventuress. She seemed too pure to be anything but an angel in muslin. When I discovered that she usually went down to the beach a little earlier in the morning than the rest of the people, I used to walk in the same direction and about the same time, so that I might be certain of seeing and perhaps meeting her somewhere during my promenade.

Not a word was spoken or a salutation given when we did meet; but I would return to the hotel thrilled with delight at having looked into her eyes and having breathed the same air in which she walked. I thought of but little else than these encounters; and the days passed slowly and the mornings quickly. I meditated during the day on the pleasure given to me in the morning.

Seeing me so often the lady must have recognized my face after half-a-dozen meetings. I do not know whether she conjectured my love for her. Though it was very pleasant to see her, the result was very unsatisfactory. I wished to know her, to speak to her and to hear her talk. I tasked my poor brains to furnish some plan by which I might accomplish these purposes. I used to haunt the grounds around the cottage in which she lived; yet I never saw her there but once, and that was on a rainy evening. Drenched to the skin, I stood without and looked through the parlor window, one of the curtains of which had not been dropped. I saw by the lamp-light that she was reading; but she had her back turned to the window. Yet I stood there until the light and the woman I loved disappeared together. I did not advance towards success. I began to despair.

One exceedingly hot morning I went down to the ocean earlier than usual. I looked up and down the crescent shaped strip of sand, but saw no one. Then I turned my gaze to the East, where the sun was rising up, out of the waters. When I looked up and down the beach my eyes sought to find the woman I loved; but they turned to the sea because they were disappointed. Yet they saw something human, even in the broad path of glory leading across the waves to the sun. About a mile and a half away and within half a mile of the open sea, there was a speck of a boat. There was somebody in it; and that somebody was waving a handkerchief. I laughed at such a cambric petition. I was not in a humor for rowing upon such a hot morning. I walked a few feet, and irresistibly turned my looks again in that direction. Again the white signal! I saw, too, that the person was not using the oars. There was a smart breeze oceanward from the cove, and, outside, the waves were enough frolicsome to overturn a boat that was not managed with care. Towards these waves the boat was rapidly drifting.

When I saw the inactivity of the person in the skiff I feared that an accident had happened; that an oar had been lost, or a hand wounded, thus disabling the figure that I could see was very quiet.

There was a little pier a few rods away from me where the boats were kept—the better ones under lock and key. Mine was fastened there; it was a light, fragile thing, but very fast when properly managed. As I was unfastening it, I noticed which one of the boats usually there was gone; a second later I discovered its oars lying on the pier. Then I fully comprehended the signal, and realised the necessity for making haste, the boat being in the throat of the bay. I pulled with a will, and heard, with feelings of delight, the bubbling water at the prow and saw the boiling wake astern. Those sounds are music sweet to the ear of an ambitious oarsman. A regular, even stroke, and his arms never tire—when once the hands are callous and the muscles strong as steel. My boating days at college now stood me in good stead, and my sharp boat cut the water into sun-tinted flakes of foam.

Once I stopped my rowing and looked ahead of me. My eyes are excellent; and I recognised at a glance that the sitter in the other boat was a woman; a little more eager scrutiny and I knew that woman to be the one I loved. I was startled by the discovery, and for several minutes my boat drifted seaward—and I thought of what had so opportunely befallen me. The opportunity for an interview with this young lady was romantically presented. But what should I say? Under the circumstances I thought that even the most ordinary topics would afford subjects for conversation; so I bent to the oars again, and in a few minutes was alongside the shell in which sat my Venus.

She had a book in one hand and her handkerchief in the other, and was unnaturally calm, though I thought her face much paler than I had ever seen it.

"Good morning!" I said, letting my boat float towards hers. "Your boating seems to have been lonely, and promised to have been dangerous. I have intercepted you—" and I pointed to the open sea a score of rods away.

She laughed. "Like the wise men of Gotham, I was going to sea in a bowl," and she rocked the fragile skiff until the water splashed over the gunwales.

"Superb fearlessness!" I said to myself. But a second later I knew that it was a nervousness that would make her pitifully weak and trembling if she were away from my presence.

"And were you not afraid?" I inquired, as her head drooped downward—as if she were very tired.

"Not until the hum of the ocean became an angry sound. Then I wished some one would pick me up; for I have no ambition to dwell in coral grottoes or garland my head with seaweed."

"But people do not go boating, or to sea, without oars."

"And I would not have gone in such a plight if I could have helped myself. But I got into the boat and unfastened it—leaving the oars on the pier; then, when I started to reach the oars, the boat went away from them; and it has been going ever since. I never heard of a boat that drifted so fast. And I am very, very thankful to you for coming to me. You have saved my life, and I have only poor feeble words with which to reward you."

(I wanted to interrupt her and say what would be a priceless return for what I had done, but I dared not speak.)

"In a few minutes more I should have been among the waves out there, my boat would have been overturned and I would have drowned. Oh! I thank you again and again and again for saving me from such a dreadful death." And she clasped her hands and leaned towards me. "God bless you, sir!" she softly exclaimed, then hid her face in her handkerchief.

When I see a woman weep the tears seem to fall upon my heart; and I really believe that I am sadder than the mourner. And, to conceal my own sadness, I fastened her boat to mine and began to row towards the village—she sitting with averted face and silent. Very soon she turned to me.

"You must not think me ungrateful because I say so little," she said, putting her hand into the water and watching how the fingers had little whirlpools behind them. "And you must not mind the tears, sir, either; for they are tears of joy. They are not the first I've wept this morning; but the others were of hope, fear and then despair. I am afraid I am very foolish."

"I don't think so. And you may rest assured that I know what you would say if you could. I am more than rewarded. I will take everything for granted and rejoice because I was enabled to save you. One cannot easily make a speech of thanks to the savior of one's life; but the thoughts that dwell in the mind of the rescued will find expression some day. Let us speak of other things."

I put up the oars and for a little while we talked about the beauties of the bay, its crags and caves, and cliffs, and about our favorite resorts. But I was longing all the time to tell my secret, only I dare not. Finally I exclaimed:

"I have very often met you in Bodlinn."

"Yes! Your face is one that I remember. We seem to be the earliest risers of the community, and we ought to be the happiest—if happiness depended on the amount of sunlight absorbed by soul and body on pleasant days. It is an amber light that lurks in the eyes like a jewel in wondrous setting."

When she spoke of sunshine, I looked first at the sun, then at my watch.

"Can you guess the time of day?" I said.

"Seven o'clock."

"Nine."

"Four hours and a half since I left home!" she cried, with an anxious look towards the distant shore, where I saw a group of people watching us, and that boats were coming towards us. There was no more chance for pleasant talk. I bent to the oars, and very soon my boat was at the landing. A tall and haughty-looking woman was standing there. As soon as the boats were fairly stopped, she spoke:

"Nettie, what have you been doing?"

"Reading "Romola" and "Drifting Away!" In truth, mama, I came very near going to sea in no capacity at all—not even as cook. This gentleman took pity upon me and has brought me back, safely and gladly," and she gave me a look of sweet gratitude as she stepped from the boat to the pier.

"I do not understand you, Nettie," said the old lady.

"Won't you tell it for me?" Nettie pleaded, turning to me. A few words sufficed to explain everything. Then the rescued came to me, and speaking quite low, said, "We—mother and I—are boarding at Mr. Warren's, on the hill yonder. If you would give us the pleasure of a visit this evening, we would deem it a great favor."

Of course I said I would go, and what happiness it would be, meaning much more than is usually meant by such phrases. She had gone but a few steps away, when she returned and added:

"I nearly forgot the most important part of the request. I am very heedless this morning; I returned to say that you will please ask for Mrs. Merrill. You must come prepared to be thanked again and again for what you have done this memorable morning. Mama dislikes what she calls scenes, and she wishes to express her thanks there, rather than in this crowd. Now, be sure and come!" and with this command she hastened away to her mother.

The crowd was inquisitive; to avoid its foppery remarks, I walked up the beach. The sun was hot, the light blinding, the air stifling, yet they did not unpleasantly affect me, for my thoughts were concentrated upon the adventure of the morning. The sum and substance of my meditations may be thus epitomised. I had been very much in love with a woman whom I saw every day, yet of whose name I was ignorant. I had been the means of saving her from a possible death. As a result of this morning's work I was going to see this woman I loved, and whose name I had learned, going to sit in her presence, talk to her and be happy. I felt nothing except the mad throbs of my heart that was in a delirium of happiness. Then it suddenly occurred to me that I did not know her name, except that she was called Nettie by this elderly lady, her mother. I was requested to ask for Mrs. Merrill. Of course that was the mother's name, and the young lady was Miss Merrill, there was no more doubt in my mind.

In consequence of my rowing and walking in the hot sun, and going without my breakfast, I began to feel very faint. Even men in love deify food, and are the better for the worship. Feverish, hungry and happy, I returned to the hotel. The clerk cried out to me as I was passing through the office in a tone of familiarity—but all hotel clerks are familiar, you know, else they would not be available:

"You had luck this morning, Lacie, I hear. Let me shake hands with you, (I came towards the desk) that I may see if your palms are blistered, and your pulse regular. You look ill."

"Hungry, Stelten, that's all."

"And your heart beats like a trip-hammer! Why, man, it sounds like a bass drum. You're in danger!"

"Yes!" and I moved away, laughing, and knowing what was the danger.

"Well, if you are calm, here's a letter marked 'in haste' that came this morning."

The superscription was in the handwriting of my partner, and this is a copy of the letter:

New York, July 8, 1850.

Mr. Geo. Lacie:

Dear Sir—Our new cashier, Sheldon, who came after your departure, disappeared yesterday with $5,000 of our money. You had better come to town immediately. James Britlin.

And to town I must go without seeing Miss Nettie. That was resolved at once. I had accepted the services of this Sheldon on excellent recommendations without seeing him, and without consulting my partner. And the result was what called me back to the city, for I must go. I wrote a note of regret, saying that I was suddenly summoned to the city, and sent it up to Mrs. Merrill.

At the store I found everything in confusion. The amount taken had been collected to make a payment, and its loss cramped us very much. We put the police at work to find the villain, though the attempt seemed almost hopeless, as he probably took that day's steamer for Europe. During the week between the time of my arrival in the city, and my return to Bodlinn, my existence was one of feverish unrest, of unanswered love. My condition of uncertainty was maddening. I wanted to get back again to the seashore, and for these reasons. I was in love with a beautiful woman. To be in love with a woman is to desire to make the object of such love your own—your wife. And my only object in returning to Bodlinn was to ascertain if Miss Nettie would be my wife. That question must be answered. So I went back to Bodlinn.

A GRAVE DISTURBANCE.

In the parish of Christ Church, Barbados islands, there is a mysterious vault, in which no one dares to deposit the dead. It is in a churchyard near, and at an elevation of one hundred feet above the level of the sea. The following details concerning the remarkable disturbances in this vault are taken verbatim from the original document in the writer's possession, under the hand of his esteemed friend, the late rector, the Rev. Thomas Harrison Orderson, D.D., who was an eyewitness (with many others, whose names will be mentioned in their proper place) of the occurrences to be related:

July 31st, 1807.—Mrs. Thomasin Goddard was buried in the vault, which, when opened to receive her, was quite empty.

February 22d, 1808.—Mary Anna Maria Chase, daughter of the Honorable Thomas Chase, was buried in the same vault, in a leaden coffin. When the vault was opened for the infant the coffin of Mrs. Goddard was in its proper place.

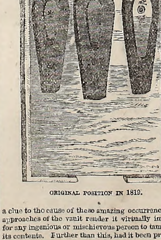
July 6, 1812.—Dorcas Chase was buried in the same vault, and the two first coffins were in their proper places.

August 9th.—The Honorable Thomas Chase was buried in the same vault. Upon its being opened the two leaden coffins were dislodged from their situation, particularly that of the infant, which appeared to have been thrown from the corner where it was first placed to the opposite angle.

September 25th, 1816.—Samuel Brewster Ames, an infant, was buried, and when the vault was opened the leaden coffins were found to have been thrown from their positions, and were in much disorder.

November 17th, 1816.—The body of Samuel Brewster was removed from the parish of St. Philip, and was buried in the vault, and great confusion was discovered among the leaden coffins.

July 7th, 1819.—Thomasin Clarke was buried, and there was much disorder among the coffins.

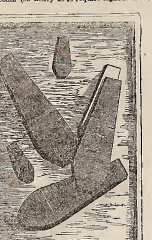


N.B.—Each time the vault was opened the coffins were placed in their proper order and position, and the mouth of the vault was regularly closed by masons.

The vault is twelve feet long and six and a half feet wide, and is partially hewn through a flinty rock. The entrance to it was secured by a massive stone, which it required six or seven men to remove.

April 18th, 1820.—The vault was opened in the presence and at the request of his Excellency the Governor, Lord Combermere. The Hon. N. Lucas, R. B. Clarke (now Sir R. Bowcher Clarke, Chief Justice of Barbados), and R. Cotton, Esqrs., were attending.

The condition of the coffins on this occasion can best be appreciated by a reference to the engraving below, which exhibits on one side the position in which the coffins were left on July 7th, 1819, and the other the disorder which was presented on April 18th, 1820, the day on which Lord Combermere inspected the vault.



These are the simple facts of the case, nor can the writer venture to make any suggestion that might give a clue to the cause of these amazing occurrences. The approaches of the vault render it virtually impossible for any ingenious or mischievous person to tamper with its contents. Further than this, had it been practicable for any one to have entered the rock, the achievement of dislodging the coffins single-handed would have been superhuman, and it is not easily to be credited that a piece of mischief of such a character would have been entrusted to many hands to carry out. Nor, again, can it be reasonably conjectured that these results were produced by some convulsion of the earth, for the effects were too local, and nothing but the coffins themselves exhibited the least trace of violence or subterranean shock.

It may be remarked here that the material of which the coffins were composed might possibly have something to do with their displacement, since there is an instance of a somewhat similar disturbance having taken place in England, where the coffins were (as those in the Barbados vault) of lead. The reader will observe that the confusion and disorder were noticeable only in the case of the leaden ones, the wooden ones were merely turned over and not flung about. The parallel occurrence alluded to took place in a village of Suffolk, named Staunton. It is stated that on opening a vault there certain leaden coffins, which had been fixed on biers, were found to be displaced and thrown about, much to the consternation of the villagers. The coffins were replaced as before, and the vault perfectly closed, when, another of the family having died, it was reopened, and its contents were discovered in great confusion. Two years after they were not only found all off their trestles, but one coffin (so heavy as to require eight men to lift it) was found on the fourth step which led down to the vaults, and it seemed perfectly certain that no human agency had effected this. This account is to be found in Captain Alexander's "Transatlantic Sketches," but the writer of this paper has never been able to find the name of Staunton in the county of Suffolk. If reliable, however, some little light is thrown on these coffin disturbances by the fact of the coffins in both the Barbados and Staunton vaults being made of lead.

Of course the negro mind attributed these mysterious results to supernatural causes. Col. Chase, it seems, was a man of evil disposition, violent and intemperate. He died by his own hand. His daughter, owing to his cruelty to her, starved herself to death; and the negroes affirmed that the other coffins would not endure the company of the Chase family, and had endeavored to expel them. It certainly assisted this superstition to know that no disturbance occurred till Col. Chase was deposited in the vault. No negro would approach the churchyard after nightfall (at least without whistling very loud to scare away the "duppies," as ghosts are called in Barbados); and such consternation, alarm and disquiet were created by the mysterious proceedings in the vault, that the coffins were removed and buried in the earth elsewhere, and the vault was closed, as it now remains. A relative of the writer is the present rector of Christ Church, and has confirmed this. The sketches from which the engraving is taken were executed on the spot by another relative of the writer; and his father, some years since, had two models constructed, exhibiting the various displacements to which the coffins were subjected. One of these models he presented to the late Bishop Blomfield, who took a great interest in this mysterious matter of the vault, the other is, I believe, deposited in the British Museum.

WILMINGTON, N. C.

Our Artist's sketches illustrate many of the interesting scenes he witnessed in the recent memorable campaign. That in Water street represents the unloading of one of our transports—the very first gunboat that had anchored there for four years. It was a pleasant sight to see the old flag once more waving in the pretty little river, and looking as though it never meant to let another flag flaunt beside it.

In accordance with their usual practice the rebels set fire to what they could no longer hold, and the result is seen in the ruins of the Navy Yard.

Taking up Obstructions from the River.

Mr. Becker, our Special Artist, says: "That none would believe without seeing them, how dexterously the rebels had constructed the obstructions submerged in the Cape Fear river to prevent the National vessels from approaching the city. The scene we illustrate occurred about two miles below Wilmington. The obstructions were rafts of hewn timber, made very sharp at the ends, so as to break in the bows of the unlucky vessels that might run against them—these logs were fastened together by a heavy chain, and then sunk about three feet below the surface of the water, by means of weights. It was by running against these hidden snares that the transport Webster was stove in so much that she sunk; fortunately, however, no lives were lost.

A Mournful Spectacle.

We need not call attention to the appalling spectacle our Artist has depicted on page 49, with sickening fidelity. We shall not dwell on a theme so repugnant to every American—the charitable supposition is that the cruel treatment our brave boys met with at the hands of their brutal captors was the result of Southern destitution, although Helper, in his searching book called the "Impending Crisis," says that "Slavery has so debased, degraded and brutalized the Southern mind as to leave it scarcely the attribute of a responsible humanity." It is impossible to contemplate such frightful scenes as many of those already published in Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, without silently acquiescing in his opinion.

The group our Artist has drawn, represents a squad of re-captured Union soldiers, who were found in a prison-pen about 12 miles from Wilmington. Of this wretched group three had become idiots from sheer horror and destitution—while all of them looked more like skeletons than living men. Among this awful band our Artist found one of his old schoolmates—but so changed in three years that he was barely recognisable. They had been formerly confined in Millen, but as Sherman's giant tread shook the rebel heart, these unhappy captives had been dragged from one hell to another, till death or idiotcy came to their relief. Let us hope that no irrational or imbecile haste to close the war will induce President Lincoln to wave the wand of oblivion over the heads of the chief offenders in this worst of all possible crimes, a rebellion against Right and Justice.

WANTED.

"A young man of unquestionable respectability desires to open a correspondence with some young lady of education and refinement, with a view to matrimony. Address, Howard, Box 304, N. Y. P. O."

Such was the advertisement that arrested my attention as I was listlessly glancing down the columns of the daily paper I held in my hand. What an unpleasant day it was! The streets, under a drenching rain, were deserted, save by a few pedestrians, who, kept abroad by necessity, came straggling along, looking particularly miserable. I had exhausted every source of amusement, read until my head ached, practised all my new music, and at last, in a terrible fit of ennui, had thrown myself down on the sofa, and in despair seized the paper, hoping to find something to interest me in that.

I do not, and never did, approve of matrimonial advertisements; who then can tell what evil spirit prompted me to answer the above? But so it was, and after several attempts and much waste of note-paper, I succeeded to my own satisfaction in penning a reply. Days passed away, and I had almost forgotten the circumstance, when the arrival of a letter addressed to Miss Alice Dunbar (my assumed name) recalled the affair to my mind.

I am a little particular on the subject of letters: have a decided antipathy to scented pink note-paper and fancy envelopes with excruciating devices of arrow-pierced hearts and adipose cupids. The missive I held in my hand was perfectly free from anything that could possibly offend the most fastidious taste. The envelope was a good substantial one, spotlessly white, and the address was written in a bold, legible hand, which immediately prepossessed me in the writer's favor. The contents did not belie the exterior. The language was elegant, the orthography and composition faultless. Here, I suppose, I should have dropped the correspondence at once and for ever, but the temptation was too great to be resisted, and so it happened that many letters were exchanged between us, and I learned to watch anxiously for the arrival of those interesting epistles, that never deviated from the manly style in which the first was written. He did not fill his letters with a dissertation on love, that would have disgusted me immediately; but there was a happy mixture of the all-important subject with the latest news of the day, criticisms on popular authors, chit-chat about the opera, drama, etc., and, above all, a tone of patriotism and devotion to the good old flag that won my heart more than anything else. Need I tell how deeply interested I became in my unknown friend? how much I thought of him during the day, and even foolishly dreamed of him at night?

At length he became anxious to see his correspondent, and as the desire was mutual, a meeting was appointed at the house of the friend who had kindly received all my letters. For days before the eventful occurrence I was one of the most restless mortals that ever inhabited this mundane sphere. Being extremely desirous of making a favorable impression, my homely little phiz appeared to me uglier than ever, and no one can tell with what feelings of consternation I watched the growth of an almost invisible pimple that most inopportunely made its appearance at the end of my nose.

At last the day came, and in my friend's own room I awaited his coming. Presently the bell rang, and shortly after the servant, previously instructed, announced his arrival. Tremblingly I descended the stairs, and pausing an instant at the parlor door to recover my composure, turned the knob and entered. The heavy curtains were partially dropped over the windows, leaving the room in a sort of delicious twilight, just the thing for such a meeting. My unknown friend had not heard my entrance, and stood with his elbow resting on the mantelpiece, examining a painting which hung above it. Something in the careless grace of the attitude struck me as familiar, but before I had time to comment upon it, some slight sound I made in advancing attracted his attention, and, turning round, he approached me with extended hand. I gave him mine, and timidly raising my eyes to his face, met the well-known blue orbs of—my uncle!

For a moment we were so overwhelmed with astonishment that neither uttered a word; but when we partially recovered from our bewilderment and the realization of our absurdly ludicrous position burst upon us, what ringing peals of laughter echoed and re-echoed through those rooms, while, through it all, tears of disappointment and vexation filled my eyes. How suddenly my beautiful air-castles had faded into nothingness! Of course there was nothing left for us but to take up our "line of march" for the parental roof, which, after mutual confessions, we accordingly did, feeling excessively foolish, but thoroughly cured of any penchant for matrimonial advertisements.

A letter to the London Times from a distinguished English metallurgist gives some interesting particulars respecting the new gun metal lately invented in Austria by Baron von Rosthorn. He says: "The new alloy which has received the name of 'sterrometal,' from a Greek word signifying tough or firm, is composed of copper, spelter, iron and tin, in proportion that may be slightly varied without much affecting the result. In color it resembles brass rather than gun metal; it is very close to its grain and free from porosity. It is possessed of considerable hardness and will take a very fine polish. Several eminent Vienna engineers have tried it for the cylinders of hydraulic presses with great success." The writer gives it as his opinion that the days of wrought iron are numbered, and that its place will be soon supplied by steel in some form or other.

FLOOD ON THE SUSQUEHANNA RIVER AT HARRISBURG—ACCUMULATION OF TIMBER AND DRIFTWOOD AT THE CUMBERLAND VALLEY RAILROAD BRIDGE

THE FLOODS.

THE rains of March caused a universal rise in the rivers of the middle States, with immense destruction of all sorts of water-side property. By the attention of our various correspondents we are furnished with sketches of several localities where the damage was greatest.

The views in Rochester are from excellent photographs by Masser; the first represents the scene looking up Buffalo street, from the east end of Main street bridge. The second shows the swelling of the Genesee river, the view being taken from the gas works, looking towards the falls.

At Harrisburg, Pa., the Susquehanna rose to a height unprecedented in the memory of the oldest inhabitant. At its greatest flood it rose 33 inches over its level in 1846. The bosom of the raging stream was covered with the wrecks it made in its seaward progress. Remnants of bridges torn from their fastenings, outhouses of every description, logs, trees, fences, evidences of the destruction which occurred above, covered the river from shore to shore.

The eastern wing of the Cumberland Valley railroad bridge was in great peril. The general impression was that a large portion of it must inevitably be swept away. The water rose far above the woodwork, and a large raft of timber of every description lodged against it, extending far into the river. It moved some 18 or 20 inches, and was only kept from giving way entirely by stout cables attached to its strongest timbers and hitched around large trees on the bank.

At Wheeling, Western Virginia, the Ohio was terribly swollen. Mr. Dardine, who sketched the scene on the 19th March, from a stand-point on the suspension bridge, remarks as follows:

"This flood was the greatest that has occurred in this region since 1862. For the last three days the city has been like a beleaguered garrison—water all around and all over, oil barrels, horses, haystacks, boxes and chicken-coops floating constantly. Wheeling Island is an American Venice. People are moving upstairs, then out on the roof, and then paddling out for higher ground. The losses are estimated by millions. The scene was wild and picturesque beyond anything your Artist ever witnessed. I cannot describe it otherwise than I have done in the sketch. One party caught $180,000 worth of oil and oil-barrels on the tract of land shown in the sketch as not covered with water. At the right is seen the steamboat Golden Era, which caught on the lower side of the bridge, and lost her chimneys and pilothouse, on her passage down. The prominent building on the left side of the street is the Williams Foundry, almost a total wreck; it was insured for less than one-half. In a house, caught below the city, (seen over the temporary island), two ladies were found drowned."

BATTLE NEAR KINSTON, N. C.

HAVING already fully described the battle near Kinston, we have now merely to add that our sketch represents the desperate conflict of the 8th of March. Kinston is a post village, capital of Lenoir co., N. C., on the left bank of the Neuse river, 80 miles south-east from Raleigh, 26 from Goldsboro and 26 from Newbern. It contains a court-house and numerous stores; tar and turpentine are procured from the forests of the county, and exported by the steamboats which navigate the river.

THE London Times thinks that efforts will be made by Mr. Lincoln to restore the revolted States singly to the Union, and other London journals denounce in strong terms the idea of a war between England and the United States.

PSYCHAURA.

THE wind of our autumn midnight
Is moaning around my door,
The curtains wave at the window,
The carpet lifts on the floor.

There are sounds like startled footfalls
In the distant chambers now,
And the tremor of my fingers
Is busy on hand and brow.

'Tis thus in the Soul's dark dwelling—
By the moody host unsought—
Through the chambers of Memory wander
The invisible airs of Thought.

For it bloweth where it listeth,
With a touch now loud or low;
Whence it cometh—whither it goeth—
None tell us, and none may know.

Now wearying round the portals
Of the vacant, desolate mind—
As the dawn of a ruined mansion
That creak in the cold night wind.

And anon an awful memory
Sweeps over it fierce and high,
Like the roar of a mountain forest
When the midnight gale goes by.

Then its voice subsides in wailing,
And, ere the dawning of day,
Murmuring fainter and fainter,
In the distance dies away.

ONLY A CLOD.

BY M. E. BRADDON,

AUTHOR OF "LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET," "BRADDON'S VICTORIA REGIA, PLAYS," "JOHN MARCHMONT'S LEGACY," "THE DOCTOR'S WIFE," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XVII.—SOMETHING LIKE FRIENDSHIP.

MAUDE HILLARY did not rise very early after that New Year's entertainment at the Cedars; painful exertions, sociable, demure and perpetual lies that had been unknown to her thought all her previous lifetime, had crowded suddenly upon her within the last few weeks, and it was scarcely strange if she well-nigh fainted under the burden. She slept for some hours on that first night of her conquest; the feverish, heavy slumber that visits upon trouble of mind and exhaustion of body. The weather sun shone with a fierce brightness between the rose-colored draperies of her window when she awoke from a painful dream to a dim sense of disturbing, though not remembered, pain. She remembered the scene of the previous night, her own desperate appeal for help, Francis Dedlow's avowal, and Julia's astonishment. She remembered all this with a burning sense of shame, and with a tender and pitying regret for Julia's wretchedness.

"And he did not love her!" she thought, "when I fancied they were so happy and united, so much what lovers ought to be. It was all false after all, and he had deceived her. But why? What motive could he have for doing her so great a wrong?"

Miss Hillary pondered upon this mystery while she dressed—unaided this morning, for she did not care to endure her maid's sympathetic remarks upon her pale face and heavy eyes; unaided, for how soon that pretty Twickenham parasite, with all its dependencies, might pass away from her, unsubstantial as the fairy palace in which Princess Babroulbeer floated away to Africa. Maude got on her plainest morning dress and went straight to Julia's room, intending to make her peace with that young lady, at any cost of self-humiliation. No base thought of Julia's obligations, no remembrance of the favors that had been heaped upon the Irish girl in that honorable habitation, had any place in Maude Hillary's mind. She thought of her friend as tenderly as she might have thought of an only sister, and she remembered nothing except the great wrong that had been done to Julia by the defection of her lover. The breach between them was not to be narrowed. When Maude entered her friend's bedroom, she only found an empty and desolate-looking apartment, in which open wardrobes and drawers, and tumbled clothing, spoke of sad and pressly frivolities, bore witness to the angry Julia's departure.

Miss Hillary's maid came running along the corridor, while her mistress stood amazed in Miss Desmond's deserted chamber.

"Oh, miss," cried the girl, "to think as you should get up and dress yourself without a bit of help, while I've been waiting and listening for the bell these last two hours! Miss Desmond, she have gone, miss, above an hour ago, and have took all her things in a fly to the railway, and wouldn't have none of the servants to go with her, and oh, miss, she looked as white as that toilet cover."

This was all Maude could hear of her sometime friend's abrupt departure from that pleasant dwelling-place which she had regarded as such a luxurious home. This was all that the servants could tell their young mistress about the splendid Julia; but in the study, where the scene of the previous night had been enacted, Maude found a letter directed to herself, in Miss Desmond's hand-writing. It was a very hurried letter; almost such a one as an English Elizabeth or a Russian Catherine might have written.

"For your father's hospitality," wrote Miss Desmond, "I shall always remain grateful, and shall be sorry to hear of any evil that may befall him. The debt I owe to you I shall also know how to remember, and shall wait the time and opportunities for its repayment.—J. D."

Maude sat for some time musing sorrowfully upon this oracular epistle. She was not in any wise terrified by her friend's threats; she was only sorry for Julia's disappointment.

"She must have loved Francis Tredethlyn very dearly," Miss Hillary thought, sorrowfully, "or she would never feel his conduct so deeply. And yet I have often fancied that she spoke of him coldly, almost contemptuously."

Poor Maude Hillary's lessons in the mysteries of every-day life had only just begun; she had yet to learn that there are other disappointments than those which fall upon those who love, other pains and sorrows than those which have their root in the heart, and that there are such things as marrying and rejoicing in marriage for the sake of thrifty thousands a year.

She spent a weary day in the pleasant drawing-room, where the red glow of a great fire illuminated as much prettiness in the way of chins, and Parisian, and bronze, and ormolu, as mortal could have wished a brie-à-brac shop in Wardour street. She spent a tiresome day, that seemed interminably long, lying on the sofa, now fire, thinking of her father's troubles and Julia's desertion. She thought also of that cruel scene in which she had seemed to play so contemptible a part. What bitter humiliation it was to look back upon, now that the mad impulse of the moment, the desperate courage that had made her snatch at any chance of help for her father had altogether passed away! How mean and pitiful the whole business seemed now to her calmer judgment! How could she ever hold light of commonsense! A borrower, a beggar almost, a miserable suppliant to her friend's affianced husband—to the man whose former friendship had basely taken advantage of that false position, to avow a passion whose least expression was an insult to her own lost love! Francis Dedlow's lover? And then what wasted humiliation, what unnecessary shame; for had not she turned upon him and upbraided him at the critical moment, forgetful of her father's desperate need!

Such thoughts as these were scarcely pleasant company all that day, and Maude was glad when it seemed so long to Maude Hillary. The slow hours crept on, and she still lay tossing restlessly on the sofa, while Gerald Hillary smoked pipe after pipe by the consolation of a troubled mind. A servant brought lamps, and crept from window to window, leaving the curtains undrawn, as a careful maid would have cut a square out of the iron door of Mr. Hillary's plate-room. The first dinner-bell rang out its harsh summons, and Maude rose at last, and informed all Twickenham that it was time for the people at the Cedars to array themselves for the evening's duties. She still lay upon the great sofa, hiding her flushed face in the pillows, and trying to quiet the throbbing of her burning head, when did I say that Mr. Hillary's unexpected guest broke down all at once in her social comedy. She could not the wearisome play no longer; she could not keep up all the while the mask of a smiling small-talk, the finery of a grand house no longer honestly maintained. Oh that it could be like this always like the old-fashioned system of some troubled slumber, giving place to a wholesome cottage and a life of decent toil!

Mr. Hillary's guests—well-known, good-looking girls, trudging in the muddy London streets, with music portfolios in their arms, while I have been the showpiece in my carriage. Mr. Hillary's guests—they would be here in a few of these, and work for papa, and see him happy, smiling at me across our little table as I gave them their tea and coffee, comparing small-talk, the finery of a grand house no longer honestly maintained. Oh that it could be like this always like the old-fashioned system of some troubled slumber, giving place to a wholesome cottage and a life of decent toil!

It was not only of late that Maude had wished her father anxiously and sadly. Very often during the year just gone, as she grew to be appreciated that, the girl had been alarmed by Lionel Hillary's moody looks and long, gloomy reveries, out of which it was his way to rouse himself by a mechanical kind of way when strangers were present. But the merchant always gave the same explanation of his serious fits—bad headaches, those constitutional headaches, which came upon him constantly through the fatigue and worry of business, those terrible headaches which had become for everything, and Maude's fears about her father related solely to his health. How should she suspect him of the dismal diagnosis of commercial disease? How should she imagine that there was any limit to the fairy purse of a merchant who was free of a thief in Aladdin's orchard of jewelled fruits?

The second dinner-bell rang and there was no sign of the merchant's return. Mr. Hillary's common thing lately for Lionel Hillary to keep his cook in a fever of vexation over the best plates and dishes, and then to dine off a chop and a potato, scrimmered and frizzled in their copper receptacles. Maude felt no special alarm about her father. Why should he be alarmed? Why should the long evening of brooding thought and care? Why should she wish him home, soon, out of all the length of her long day? Why should she not have sure one word of comfort where with to greet him? She was thinking this, when the door was opened suddenly in an eager hand, and Mr. Hillary came into the room.

He daughter rose from the sofa, startled by the suddenness of the event. There is a small action that of opening a door and entering a room; but there was as great a change in Mr. Hillary's personality as if for twenty years had suddenly been lifted from his life.

"My darling!" he cried, taking his daughter in his arms, "I am so glad I have to thank. It was your doing, was it not?"

"What, papa?"

"The money—the twenty thousand pounds."

"Twenty thousand pounds!"

She thought the burning pain in her head had engendered some sudden delirium. She could not believe that this was her father's face, lighted by a hopeful smile, such as she had not seen upon it for so long as her three years.

"What twenty thousand pounds, papa?"

"The sum that has been placed to my credit today, anonymously. The bank people refused to tell me the name of my benefactor. I took to you, Maude, to solve the mystery. There is only one man whom I know of rich enough to advance such a sum of money—young enough to do it in so Utopian a manner. There is only one man, Maude, and his name is Francis Tredethlyn. Tell me, my dear, have I guessed rightly?"

"You have, papa. Yes, I am sure you have. Francis Dedlow and I was so angry with him last night. It was very good of him to do this, papa."

"Good of him!" cried the merchant. "Good of him to have advanced me twenty thousand without a half penny worth of security! Upon my word, Maude, it is good; and I can assure you it's kind of goodness that is very uncommon in the city.

CHAPTER XVIII.—POOR FRANCIS.

FROM the second day of the new year things went pleasantly enough in the Twickenham boudoir. How could Maude do otherwise than rejoice in the salvation of her father's honor—to say nothing of his commercial prosperity—even though the salvation had been obtained by a great humiliation upon her own part? She would have borne that humiliation very willingly, and would have freely endured her self-degradation to Francis Tredethlyn, could she have seen Julia Desmond reconciled to her lover. But the separation between them was complete and final; and on the scene on New Year's night, was a perpetual reproach to Maude Hillary.

She was not able to be quite happy, therefore, even though a terrible burden had been lifted from her heavy heart; even though she saw the dark cloud swept away from her father's life. Francis Tredethlyn had departed from her for ever on that terrible night in her father's study at Brighton; and there was a deep softness, a pensive tenderness in her manner now, that made her even more lovely than she had been in the days of her father-elect. The ruling passion of her simple mind—had been intensified by that grief. Maude Hillary had loved her lover as fondly as ever, and there was something very beautiful in the union which now existed between the father and daughter. Mr. Hillary had been surprised into confidences that made a new tie between himself and his child. He could never again entirely conceal from Maude that tender friendship and consoler. He could never again think of her as a beautiful, frivolous creature, only intended to wear expensive dresses and flash about in graceful attitudes amongst the costly brie-à-brac of a fashionable drawing-room. He had found a friend in his child, and perceived with pleased intelligence to the study of the customs and dealings common in that mysterious region called the city. He would have liked to understand her father's position—for she was tormented by a feverish anxiety as to the repayment of Francis Tredethlyn's twenty thousand pounds, but the complications of an Australian merchant's trade, as affected by wars and rumors of wars, by alterations in the freight and insurance and by the caprices of the public, were altogether beyond her comprehension, and she was fain to give up the attempt in despair, and accept any solution which her father cared to make to her respecting the altered aspect of his affairs.

There was no more talk at the Cedars than usual during the bleak early months of the year. Mr. Hillary worked very sedulously in the city during the day, and dined with his wife and Maude with frivolous young idlers or ponderous city-bred matrons and their fashionably-educated daughters. The entertainments engendered by the contemplation of inevitable ruin had given place to the careful dealing of a man who has a difficult task to perform, and is resolved to do it. You can scarcely expect the daughters of King Danaus to labor very arduously in the filling of those buckets which they have in the bold water; and if the buckets are only thin at the bottom, and may possibly carry their contents safely to the well, it is worth while to make the experiment.

Francis Tredethlyn's twenty thousand pounds had done wonders for Lionel Hillary; but the dryrot had been in the house some time, and in his stately ship of which the merchant was captain, and the successful navigation of the vessel, amidst all the shoals and whirlpools and rocks of the commercial ocean, was by no means an easy thing.

But Mr. Hillary was sanguine, and his daughter saw the new hopefulness and brightness of his face, and was perfectly happy. She was not quite happy, for Harcourt Lowther's letters grew more despondent and complaining by every mail. The indifference of Maude Hillary for her prosperity and her indifference; she made no indifferent, he argued, or she would have succeeded in obtaining her father's consent to her marriage with the penniless officer.

"There are girls who will go through fire and water for their lovers," he wrote, in an epistle that was half filled with fierce reproaches. "I have seen the power of a woman's devotion; and there are women, only a great deal rarer creature, and not the daughter of a millionaire. I cannot believe that you could fail to influence your father, if you cared to do so. If you loved me, Maude, this business would have been settled long ago."

Did she love him? That was a question which she had never set herself to answer. Had they not engaged themselves to each other in the pretticst and most childish fashion, like a modern Master of Ravenswood and Lucy Ashton? Maude took the fact of her love for granted. All the sweetest and tenderest dreams of her life were mingled with the memory of Harcourt Lowther. He was so superior to all other men who had paid her their homage; and it may be that his contemptuous bearing towards those other men had been a part of the fascination of his manner. He had affected the character of Edgar Ravenswood to—that elegant Timon of Athens—a man—which is so intensely charming in the eyes of a very young woman, and so capricious it may be. And with all this, he had been so devoted, so frightfully exacting, so deliciously jealous! Maude looked back to the one unstranded period of her life, and saw Harcourt Lowther's image radiant in all the light of her own youthful fancies. So the worshipper in a village church gazes upon some painted wooden figure of a saint, glorified by the glitter of tapers, the brightness of flowers and evergreens and decoration. Love was also to separate the lamps and the flowers about the shrine from the image which they adorned? How was she to discover the paltry nature of that clay out of which the graceful figure was fashioned? Harcourt Lowther represented to her all that was intellect and best in her early girlhood; and sitting alone, through long and lengthened hours, in the empty rooms at the Cedars, Maude Hillary recalled very sadly upon the only love story of her life.

She had vowed never to speak of Harcourt to her father once since the beginning of the year, but her timid pleading had been met by a cruel refusal.

"Understand me at once and for ever, Maude," Lionel Hillary said, sternly; "such a marriage as that can never be. If you were the great heiress people think you, I might gratify this fancy, and have gratified other fancies, foolish and extravagant in their way, but at the present time nothing in the world would induce me to secure under my law, and I cannot afford to see my only child the wife of a penniless adventurer. I wish you to be happy, Maude, but not after a sentimental girl's notion of happiness. I know what all these pretty theories about a struggle and cottage and poverty come to when they are put into practice. I have seen the blighted maid of all work, and the miserable dinner, and the still more miserable parlor, and stale bread and rank butter, that belong to love in a cottage. And more than this, Maude, I know that Harcourt Lowther is the very last man to ally himself to a doverless wife."

"Ah, but think you know him!" Maude murmured softly. She thought she knew her lover as well herself, and fancied him the most generous and devoted of men because he had given her a few half-guinea bouquets, purchased at cost from a coaxing florist. "Ah, dear papa, how little you know him! He is always reproaching me with my fortune, and lamenting that fate has made between us. Let me tell him of your difficulties, let me tell him that I am no longer a millionaire's daughter, that I am free to marry the man I love. Ah, let me tell him—"

"Not a word, Maude," answered Lionel Hillary, "if you wish to please me, if you have any love or respect for your father. Remember that I have trusted you with secrets that a man seldom confides to his nearest kin."

"And your confidence shall be sacred, papa," Miss Hillary replied, submissively. And thus ended her interference in the love affairs of Harcourt Lowther.

She was fain to be contented, however, remembering the great trouble which had been so near and awful, and the cheerful load that had been taken away. She was fain to remember, shudderingly, the feverish horror of that night at Brighton, and to thank God that Francis Tredethlyn was the man to whom she owed her father's rescue. She was grateful to him, but she could not put entirely away from her the sense of shame left by that scene in the study, and Julia Desmond's passionate reproaches. She could not forget that it was for her sake Francis Tredethlyn had helped her father, and that the burden of a great obligation must rest upon her conscience until that twenty thousand pounds was repaid. Poor Maude's unbusinesslike mind entirely ignored any such thing as interest. Mr. Tredethlyn had made no one single thought of the loan itself, and the question of its repayment was perpetually in her mind. Had she not been the merchant's daughter, and the money had been lent, and was she not in a manner the actual debtor?

Things were much better in the city, her father told her; but upon two or three occasions when she had ventured to hint her anxiety respecting the repayment of Francis Tredethlyn's money, the merchant's answers had filled her mind with vague discomfiture. There was an indefinite fear in Miss Hillary's manner that alarmed Maude's keen sense of right and honor.

"Tredethlyn is too well off to want his money in any dreadful hurry, my dear," he said, "He is not likely to become a very pressing creditor."

She helperess about Isleworth and Twickenham were friends with their neighbors, but when Francis Tredethlyn came again to the Cedars, Mr. Hillary had called upon the young man at his hotel several days before he appeared at the evening, and had only great difficulty wrung from him an admission of the fact that he was the anonymous lender of the twenty thousand pounds that had saved the merchant from ruin and disgrace.

"My dear Tredethlyn, why should you insist upon any disguise?" Mr. Hillary said, with a pleasant smile that one would scarcely have considered in accordance with a position so that in which the merchant found himself with regard to this sympathetic, confiding Croesus. "It is not enough to have been the most generous of men, without trying to carry generosity to the verge of Quixotism. How can I thank you, my dear sir, for your service? I know that Maude betrayed my necessities to you, and it the excitement of those unfortunate hours, and I know that the loan of twenty thousand pounds do not drop from the skies. My dear fellow, I am most heartily to indebted to you for what you have done. It was a very noble thing to do, an action that any man might be proud of doing. If I had ever doubted your having good blood in your veins, your conduct in this one matter would have settled my doubts. But I never did doubt it, my dear Tredethlyn. I have recognized you from the first as a gentleman, not by the right of an accidental thirty thousand a year, scraped out of all manner of commer-tial gutters by a miserly uncle, but by virtue of some of the best blood in the west of England."

And then Mr. Hillary stretched out both his hands, and shook those of Francis Tredethlyn in the vigorous grasp, and altogether the interview could scarcely have been more entirely satisfactory had the merchant written a cheque for the twenty thousand pounds on the spot. Indeed, to Francis, any immediate repayment of that money would have been a grievous mortification. Was it not delightful to him to remember that he had been of service to her father? Was not the money advanced in the most delicate kind of light that Maude and the man who loved her so dearly and so hopelessly—only a very sordid, carchy link, but better than nothing?

"I offended her very much that night," Francis thought; "but perhaps she will forgive me, and remember me kindly, when she thinks that I have been useful to her father."

But when Mr. Hillary begged Francis to renew his visits to Twickenham, the young man resisted those friendly invitations as obstinately as if the Cedars had been the most obnoxious place on earth. He could not muster up courage to encounter Maude Hillary after that scene in the little study. What if he had offended too deeply for pardon? What if she slew him with a frozen glance from her lovely eyes? Again and again in his lonely chambers—haunted by the dusky twilight of the early spring evening, he had ventured to haunt the neighborhood of the old brick-built mansion at Twickenham; but he could not bring himself to go any nearer to the shrine of his divinity, and he made all manner of lame excuses in answer to Mr. Hillary's cordial invitations.

He was only a clerk; only an uneducated rustic, newly cast upon a strange world, open to all the pleasant snares and pitfalls laid for the simple-minded possessor of thirty thousand a year. Heaven only knows the perils and temptations into which a young man would have fallen in such under similar circumstances. It is something in Francis Tredethlyn's favor that he went mistakenly to the Cedars in the first instance, and that he would wear his horse's shoes out in discussion-rides about the twelfth lanes and roads in the neighborhood of Twickenham Green.

And in the meantime Messrs. Kursdale and Scardon were supposed to be busily employed on their second act, and the raising city might or might not have any right to another name than that of Susan Tredethlyn. Very little came of the lawyer's endeavors. Several advertisements had been inserted in the Times; but it is to be feared that the lost and missing advertiser for the first column and a half was rather a weary recognition, far removed from that comfortable sphere of life in which the morning paper ever possesses the delightful quality of breakfast-table. No reply came to any of those mysteriously-worded appeals to Frances Tredethlyn's cousin which were sent to Scardon by the lawyer and his legal advisers; and the image of the friendless girl grew paler and fainter day by day in the mind of Maude Hillary's admirer.

At last fortune—who will generally do anything in the world if you have patience enough to await her own time for doing it—brought about the result which Francis Tredethlyn had so obstinately avoided, and fondly desired. It was early again in the rainy April day at the corner not opposite Apsley House, Francis, saw Maude Hillary's carriage drive into the Park.

Yes, there she was, with her sunny hair framed in spring blossoms and white straphanz. The young man watched the vehicle as it rolled away in a Parisian bonnet, and half wondered if the folds of her white burnous were not a pair of downy pinions that sprang from her shining shoulders. He grew very red and uncomfortable, and in another moment would have yielded to the impulse that prompted him to seek refuge in flight, but before he could do so she carriage was close to the rails, Maude Hillary had recognised him, and had told the coachman to stop.

She was not offended with him then; she forgave him, and thought of him kindly. His heart swelled with a joy that was almost overpowering. Ah! this was love. How different from that placid sense of affection with which he had regarded his cousin Hope! how much more tumultuous! how infinitely more painful!

"I have wanted so much to see you, Mr. Tredethlyn," Maude said. After shaking hands with her bewildered adorer; why have you never been to Twickenham?"

"I—I could not—she—I thought you were angry with me," stammered Frances, very awkwardly. Ah, how sad it is that the presence of those we love best, and whose eyes we would most desire to appear at an advantage, should entail upon us the annihilation of anything like ease or grace of manner! Mr. Tredethlyn felt himself becoming purple and apoplectic under the influence of that seraphic creature, whose image had filled his mind unceasingly for the last six months.

"Angry with you!" exclaimed Maude; "how should I be otherwise than grateful to you for what I remember to be very good you have been to papa? Believe me, Mr. Tredethlyn, I am not so proud to own the extent of our obligation to a friend whom I most sincerely. You can never know how grateful I am for the service you have rendered my dear father."

She bent her head, and the spring flowers in her bonnet were very near him as she said this in a low, earnest voice. But in the next moment the memory of that uncomfortable scene in the study flashed back upon her, and she felt that she must always be more or less in a false position with regard to Francis Tredethlyn. She made a little effort to set herself right before she parted from him.

"You have seen Julie; you and she are reconciled, I hope, Mr. Tredethlyn?"

"No; indeed, I have never heard from her since—since I left the Cedars. Your papa told me that she—oh, Miss Hillary, I think it was better that we should part. I don't thing that we had either of us ever really cared for each other. It was better that it should end as it did."

But I would give so much to find Julie, to hear where she is."

Francis Tredethlyn shook his head hopelessly. He had a vague idea that he had not done his very uttermost in the search for his cousin Susan, and he recoiled with terror from the idea of having to engage in a hunt for Miss Bellingham.

"Perhaps, Mr. Tredethlyn, I hope that all will come right after all; and I hope that you will believe I am grateful for your goodness to my father."

She held out her hand, and the Cornishman took it in his own, and pressed it passionately to his lips, and then he turned and walked away from an altar. The carriage drove off immediately after this, and Francis Maude Hillary had left the park by the Kensington gates on her homeward route.

He went home, but not disconsolate. Had he not seen and spoken with that divinity before whom he was the simplest worshipper who ever kneeled before a shrine? Was he not assured of her forgiveness?—nay, even of her gratitude? Her gratitude—Maude Hillary's gratitude, in exchange for all the love that man had ever held so lightly. Money was indeed good for something, if it could buy the rapture of that little interview with a girl, in which Francis had played so very poor a part.

He went home, and carried Maude Hillary's image with him, and would sit up and down his big sitting-room in the Covent Garden Hotel, smoking a cigar and thinking of the woman he loved. He thought of her until he forgot that Susan Claude Melmotte could have thought of her father. Beaumont's diabolical suggestions had prompted him to his treacherous purpose. He thought of her as innocently as a schoolboy thinks of the stage fairy queen in a Christmas pantomime, and he had forgotten her utterly, and say aloud in his mind; only when a brief note reached him from Lionel Hillary, renewing the old intercession on behalf of the Cedars, that dear Pratch could no longer resist the voice of the charmer, but was fain to pack his portmanteau and fly to Paris, to be nearthe object of his affections. Whence Mr. Hillary was to convey him in the mail phaeton to Twickenham, She was not angry with him, and he might hasten to the sunshine of her presence! For a little while he might enjoy the dangerous delight, and then the office to whom Mr. Scardon had referred him for advice to claim her, and there would be a wedding at the old church by the Thames; and he, Francis, would see her no more. Perhaps he might be summoned with orange flowers before he departed for ever into the outer darkness where she was not.

DEATH IN THE LATEST FASHIONS.

Let's do it after the high Roman fashion,
And make Death proud to take us, said Cleopatra, in the most characteristic and most characteristic of parting scenes on poetical record, in which "the wrangling Queen" and "the Serpent of old Nile," to use Antony's favorite epithets, are trying and find a way and journey, like the great Queen whom she was, who had died in the undoing of a courtesan, which means something of a cogitate.

The decisions of Death by paganism have been modified, not in point of severity, but in refinement and splendid. Think of such obsequies of those of Radamis, Rhadamanthus, Sardanapalus, and Cleopatra! Can one so admirably sung by Herr Freiligrath, in which a horde of living women, with all their warm treasure of beauty, were slaughtered to lay and feed! Think of the family festival of the Battle, put on record by Sir Stamford Raffles in his work on the Indian Archipelago! Can anything be more horrible? And yet, what are their grandfathers and grandmothers when the sons and daughters of Java are assembled in a festive party given on the occasion passed as an exceeding sprightly jollification.

But the above, may be said, are savage death-ceremonies. Can Great Britain, Grand forerunner in chivalry, Grand Commander of the Order of Civilization (circumstances considered) analogous? London, the headquarters of the above claimed perfection, has given an answer to the above interrogatory in the affirmative within the last few weeks. In a couple of examples it has proved that civilization is not to be outdone by savagery, and that no matter whether cockneistic or lay, such a show as a lying in state, that grim union of Death and upholstery, is to be had in the Caledonian Road, or Belgrave Square, was timed with white and amber satin. The discreet Mr. Scardon referred to the Belgravian client, but in the fact the shoes of splendor had been put on. The gloved hands were garnished by rings more precious than those the wore with real, sound stones that are near in cut. On it he said that love and reverence prompted the arrangement of the body in a manner of repose and corruption? Dismal, hollow lie! Coarse, tawdry disrespect, rather. It is the modern Angel, in whose coming reverence is that instant, awful sustenance of change, not to be arrested, not to be disputed, by rouge, and jewels, and millinery, or even by a last look lined with white and amber satin!

We have been used to comment freely on the wasteful arrogance of our ancestors, and on their bustling with the destroyer, inch by inch—by scene of them in their own persons. Who has forgotten Princess Buckingham, the bastard daughter of King James II., and her pretensions to a state funeral by Queen Anne's order? "She has sent for Mr. Austin," he writes to Sir Horace Mann, "and settled the ceremonial for her burial. On Saturday she was to lie in state, the herald dying before it the pomp was come home. She said, 'Why won't they send the canopy for me to-day? Let them send it, though the tassels are not finished.' But yesterday was the greatest scene of all. She made her ladies vow to her that, if she should die on Sunday, they would not sit down in the room before she was dead. She not only, 'continues he keen chronicler, "regulated the ceremony of her own burial, and dressed up the waxen figure to herself for Westminster Abbey, but she shewn the same unfeeling taste on the death of her only son, Charles, in his figure, and sending message to her friends that if they had a sitted to see him lie in state, she would carry them to Westminster by a back door.

"Princess Buckingham sent," continues Walpole's narrative, "to the old Duchess of Marlborough to borrow the feathers which had decorated the dapper Duke Old Sarah, as mad and as proud as herself, sent her word that 'it had carried my Lord Marlborough, and should never be profaned by any other corpse.' The Buckingham returned, that 'she had spoken to the undertaker, and he promised to make a hearse with twenty plumes.'"

It might have been hoped that the world was becoming wiser, and that the simple and touching mortuary dispositions of the last deceased Queen of England might not be considered as "well as an example," "simple," said the will of that sovereign lady, "in all her habits," and that any request set by herself, in regard to her funeral, was, that, during the widow of our Saior-King she should be borne to her grave by nine of sorts, and that the most loving nurse could give to this provision, which sets such a discretion above and apart from the whole of the coffin lined with ember and white satin onto a figure for a paraphrase, as for which mourners are directed by advertisements where to apply for "Effects" and cards to enter the Black Chamber.

Let us go back for a homelier illustration. I was born there is a week, in the Cornish village of Polperro, one little less preposterous universally cultivated, and a little more picturesque than Bath, even since the days who embraced Disraeli, under pressure of a rigor which has no longer any existence anywhere in England whatever, in the way of sentimental music and pictures, the devices of the Evil One, and who took up their abode in the most picturesque of streets. I remember a house whose mind was made uneasy by the sight on a field of bed clover, and another who assumed it sinful to wear any garment but that of black. Even in these narrow and sincere families permitted the punishing of poetry and music, which, however, were not considered sinful in the case of funerals. I am free to tell the truth as for sway, and the departure of every one whom the village considered worthy of a decent interment, there is acting up to her consequence—the brave head of a large and attached family—who laid herself down to rest in an advanced age, leaving behind her every just and desirable provision for the comfort of every one that was left behind her. Then, indeed, there appeared on the extreme moment came; and those she turned to account by ordering the dances which was to be given at the funeral by her own dear friends. "I will be sure," she said, "that the ladies are sharp; for when they are sharp, they are generous. Somebody sat in the bottom at the table, the goose was mangled, and nobody got a proper helping."

The "sharp" funeral baked meats," however, has been exploded in this country, save, perhaps, in the wilds of Northumberland. Way was clung to the barbarisms of making the bed of Death a show? Why did ghastly funereal magnificence, so terrible to rest grief, so disheartening to the people entirely? No one but has ever taken part or place in my spectacle of the kind, but has felt that the whole business, and every part of it, to have been repulsively struck with the incongruities it must present. I was in Victor Hugo's celestial, fairy Jersey when the Emperor Napoleon, the nephew of M. de Quelen, the predecessor of that archbishop who, in the Revolution of 1830, was pelted by the people on the barricades of 1848. Nothing could be well more unpreserve than the appearance of the cathedral, hung with black cloth for the occasion, and up one of the side aisles of which the spectators crept in silence—their approach to the nave of the dense yellow candlelight which, as regards the management of crowds, our Gallic friends understand so well. Drooling pauses accompanied the slow, solemn, and enhanced like gloom of the scene. But the suppressed talk of the men (correctly dressed in black) and the low, hushed whispers of the step by step pilgrimage, was of a cynical uncleanness, that made the cheek redden with shame. And when we got to the end of the dreary display laid in the cathedral, with the face uncovered, and where each was allowed ten seconds' contemplation at the rate of a illuminated chapel, to gaze on the sight, and (by exactness) to say a Prier or Ave for the parted soul. "Stop, for God's sake!" I heard one say to his companion, "you ooh which shall not pollute this paragraph, 'only look! Look at the nose! Look at the mouth! Look at the hair!" The other swore by they had done no such thing; and by digesting and heating on the fleet, the two began to fight, and were only with difficulty taken out of solemn one might have thought by the presence of the dead, and of those who had been in some sort a king and a ruler there.

There is not one reader of the above desultory paragraphs, who, on the death of a near estate, and near and dear faculties of observation, who could not add to them a dozen more, and perhaps more ghastly and revolting experiences of his own, in which every feeling of what is just and becoming and affectionate to the dead, has revolted against the monstrous bustling to fuss and festival, to pleasure and triumph, to the hours when the heart should be most strong. The Romans put upon hand ceremonies—but which are cruel, disproportionate, repulsive, barbarous, in short, as belonging to the awful moment of separation between the living and that which should be dead. How long will it be ere feeling is state shall cease out of a disgusting mask, which professes itself to be a kind of thought and enlightenment?

SKATING is a most healthy exercise, bringing the body into action by a variety of motions, and elevating the spirits by the rapidity of motion and the delightful repose. Elopatch, the celebrated German poet, was a great skater, and once, and once, and among his eccentricities, "It is an exercise in which man, like the Homeric gods, moves on the wings of the wind," transmuted into solid ground." His companion, the contemporaneous poetic, the classical Klopstock, and other Germans of note, have also celebrated skating. It is likewise referred to in that ancient Icelandic work of "the Edda," written more than 800 years ago on the mythology of the gods and heroes of the north of Europe, the latter being represented as distinguished for activity, and skill in skating. The best skaters are found in Holland, and ladies practise the exercise, and where many and women often skate to market—Saturday being the favorite occasion for such a trip. Nova, the skating and sleighing, the picturesque fur costumes of the Dutch ladies, and fashions below, tend to render a Russian winter delightful.

GAMBLING IN CHINA.

THE Chinese are passionately addicted to gambling, and the most diverse variety of games of chance in common use among them does credit to their ingenuity and invention, for it is not likely that they have learned anything from their neighbors. The respectable merchant, who devotes the hours of daylight to transacting his business, spends the evening in adjusting the most trifling items of account, will stake his thousands of dollars overnight with the greatest complacency. Every piece of society is imbued with the passion. I have amused myself watching the coolies in the streets of Canton gambling for their dinner. The itinerant cooks carry with them, as part of the wonderful apparatus of a culinary establishment from which the respectable article, a large number of bamboo, containing a number of stains on which are marked various characters. These apple sticks are shaken up in the tube, the coolie-taste for her dumpling directs the number, and the lucky winning found on it so does he pay for his repast. So attractive is gambling in any form to the Chinese, that Christian people will generally prefer to risk paying cooking for the remote chance of getting a meal for nothing. On one occasion I volunteered to act as proxy for a hungry boy who stood close to my big lunch. The offer was accepted with eagerness, and I was fortunate enough to guess my countenance a dinner for nothing. I was once put down as a professor of the black art, and actually hooted by a crowd of others, who flocked round to do them a similar favor, which, of course, I prudently declined. Intact I indeed been successful a second time, the displeasure of the tempting morsels would probably have protected me from the reference as an invasion of his prerogative, which is to win and lose. Cock-fighting, quail-fighting, &c. of course, frequently ruined by the practice. They become passionately fond of it. Shrill, every combination of duty and interest is sunk, and they play to strike while the iron is hot, and to lose it, and to be noble, and to seem to mumble for cents. In the last class of all, a slice of opium will be a common portalang, in the early. Engines of still the Chinese are no less accomplished. Cock-fighting, quail-fighting, &c. are to be seen in some infill sway at every teahouse, where the people assemble to spend the evening. Even the gambling-house in these places exhibit intense interest in their exhibition of the winner, and any pair of Chinese quail-pugilists may have as far Wilkie's celebrated picture.

"Sirrah, sir," said the husband and father, "if ye sit down a wee, we may be able to tell ye, for we're just trying to settle that point."

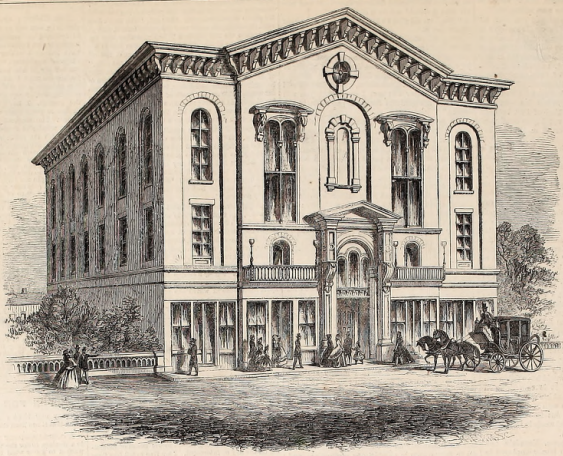
ESCAPE FROM TURKISH.—During the war of Independence several of Kolokotroni's Highlanders, stationed in Arcadia, were surprised by a party of the Pashas of the Morea, and made prisoners. Among these was Demetrius Zaimis, a young man of great promise. Not wishing to be separated from his companions, he refused to give his name, and was treated as a common soldier. Orders were given that he should be impaled. He was accordingly stripped naked, and a sharp stake was placed in the ground. Two executioners then seized him, and were about to perform their office, when he begged that he might be allowed to say a few words. This was granted, and he addressed the Turks in their own language, telling them that he was a Turk, and that he would prepare it, and allow the first executioner to be impaled. Struck by the strength and beauty of the young warrior among them. This story only gained credence with the Turks, and the executioners refused. Another request was instantly complied with. Being taken into the house, he was left alone with a guard, who had no choice to pick up. Having bolted these bars, he rushed his face with their pikes, and laying his head on a log of wood, severed the strongest man among them to strike at his neck with his scimitar. Accordingly, as Indian, among a blow with all his strength, cut with such force that the head flew off to the distance of several yards. The Indians were lost in amazement both at their own credulity and at the address by which the prisoner had escaped the dangerous death prepared for him. Zaimis availed himself of this confusion of their victim, they were so pleased with his ingenuity that they allowed him to depart, making further ingenious and excellent on the remaining prisoners.

UNITED STATES COLLEGE

Of Business and Finance, New Haven, Conn.

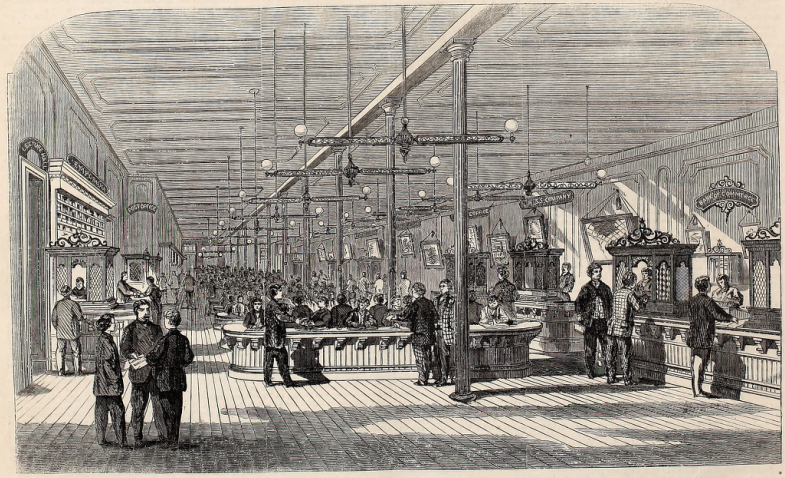
AMONG the many signs of progress which the American people are exhibiting to the world, none seems more remarkable than the interest taken in and means adopted to promote the cause of education. If anything augurs well for our future greatness, it is certainly this; for the true worth of a State or a nation in the long run must be based upon the worth and intelligence of its citizens. And as we are destined to take the lead in business and commerce, no branch of education requires a higher order of effort or greater executive ability than that which shall fit the young men of the nation for the channels of trade and finance. We are, therefore, in this connection, gratified in being able to lay before the public, as worthy of its interest, the institution whose name heads this column.

The aims and objects of the United States College of Business and Finance are—



To be a regular incorporated institution, with endowments and regular professorships, and with power to confer degrees. With this end in view, it is to be made thoroughly national in its character and comprehensive in its aims:

1st. By educating disabled soldiers at half the regular tuition. 2d. By granting life scholarships free to others in reduced circumstances, who have diminished themselves in the service of their country in its hour of peril. 3d. By placing the tuition at such a reduced figure that all classes may become practically educated for the duties of a commercial life. 4th. To open wide the door for business culture to the women of America—in a word, it is intended to be to the business and financial world what West Point is to the military, or Yale is to the literary. The long felt want of an institution that shall keep pace with our wonderful growth as a commercial people; the great and still growing demand for a first-class financial and business college dedicated to the nation, it is confidently believed is fully supplied in the founding of the United States College at New Haven.



It is intended to fit young men for merchants, bankers, business managers, financiers, accountants, correspondents, telegraph operators, and all other duties which a business life engenders.

Its Board of Managers and Visitors comprises some of our best educators and most patriotic and eminent business men. Chief-Justice Chase is its chairman.

A reference to the interior view of the main actual business department of the college on this page will convey a general idea of the mode of business training. This is the most comprehensive division of the course. In this, by means of beautifully engraved bank-notes and nicely prepared samples of merchandise, with appropriate business forms, the students are thrown into all the varied relations of business men. The merchants at the counters, the officers in their banks, and the incumbents of the several subordinate offices, including insurance, railroad, shipping, exchange, post-office, etc., each representing these branches in a miniature world of mercantile traffic, are thus all taught the practical application of business principles. They are indeed a business community, whose requirements and strict discipline impart business habits, cultivate business address, test honesty and integrity, develope energy of character, and subsidize every acquisition of the student, and unfold the ambitious and aspirations of manhood.

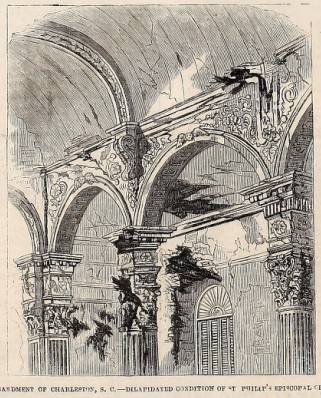
In deciding upon the Executive Officers, the Board of Managers have been fortunate in the selection of Prof. Thos. H. Stevens as President, and C. E. Wells, Esq., as Secretary, both these gentlemen being well and favorably known to the business and literary community.



They combine to a remarkable degree those traits of intellectual and moral worth, so essential to the character of the true teacher, and their reputation as educators and business men entitle them to the entire confidence of the public.

It may be considered fortunate that a place combining so many features of interest and elevating influences as New Haven possesses should have been selected in which to found an institution of learning, dedicated to the business and financial interests of the nation. It is unsurpassed for salubrity of atmosphere, fine parks, pleasant drives, bay and harbor scenery, imposing churches, seminaries, colleges and classical associations, eminent business and literary men, both in civil and military life.

Its institutions of learning, however, are its crowning glory. It is the seat of Yale College, and a grand centre of educational interest.

CHARLESTON, S. C.

Fortunately for our cause the sketches we present to our readers in the present number do not illustrate battles, but another aspect of the present war—the humiliation of the vanquished rebels. When taken in connection with a sketch on another page, that representing our rescued prisoners, we cannot help thinking that our magnanimity becomes sublime in contrast.

BOMBARDMENT OF CHARLESTON, S. C.—DILAPIDATED CONDITION OF ST PHILIP'S EPISCOPAL CHURCH

Mr. Crane, our Special Artist, writing from Charleston, says: "I send you sketches illustrative of the supplying the wants of the thousands of poor and needy of Charleston, of all ages, ages and conditions, and I may justly add colors.

"When the rebels left Charleston, a permit was granted after the most urgent entreaty by the General Commanding to Alderman Williams, whereby all the rice and salt in Charleston which belonged to the rebel government should be turned over to the city authorities, to be delivered by them to the needy of the city weekly, in quantities of a peck or thereabouts. Alderman Williams informed me that it was with the greatest difficulty he prevented the last retreating rebels from destroying immense quantities of rice, in which case absolute starvation would have ensued to the thousands of old men, women and children now here, they being mostly the wives and families of men who are or who have been in the rebel service. Separate days are appointed for both whites and blacks when they are to receive their allotment of rice, etc. Capt. E. W. Fowler, the gentlemanly and obliging Post-Commissary at Charleston, has charge of this duty, and most faithfully does he perform it. Alderman Williams, of Charleston, is Chairman of the Relief Committee, and works day and night to benefit the thousands of people in this miserable city.

West Point Mills.

"On the Ashley river, and a short distance from the Arsenal, are located these mills. They are large and commodious; here is where the hungry and almost starving population resort to from all parts of the city every week to obtain the peck of rice and allowance of salt, necessary for their very existence. Amid all wastage, and clothed in rags, I have seen thousands of the unwilling victims to this cruel war plod through mire, mud and water to obtain their pittance. When the supply gives out, heaven only knows what these poor people will do. The rebels attempted to destroy these mills.

"When the hour arrives for the people to be served, they go up one way to the mills, and come back another. They are obliged to do this to prevent being helped twice the same day. When the crowd have all passed Calhoun street and Lucas, en route to the mills to be served, the people who have preceded them stand checked with bags on their shoulders, waiting under

Taking the Oath of Allegiance.

We cannot better illustrate our sketch than by quoting some late remarks from the Charleston Mercury, now conducted by loyal citizens:

"It is not the policy nor the intention of the National Government, as many well-disposed persons seem to think, to force any citizens into the oath of allegiance into the army. The object is to give all honest and law-abiding men an opportunity of declaring their intentions, and to distinguish between those who are and are not hostile in their feelings, actions, or sentiments to the Union. There can be no neutrality, no evasion. The Government recognizes but two parties, and it is time now before the country—Union men and rebels—and it is for the loyal citizens of Charleston to say to which side they belong.

"It has been objected by some that having never taken up arms, entered the rebellion in any manner, or, if aided their objections or assented to secession, that the slim discretion of the republic is under no obligation to confer on them the privilege of taking the oath of allegiance. The proclamation of a large number of persons, who have not only been in active service to the Confederacy, but have a powerful influence with the people of their localities, is a matter of political. It will be an inspiriting example to the timid and wavering, but well-meaning persons who are holding back, fearful of being considered by their old neighbors or acquaintances.

"By order of the War Department, no persons who have been in the rebel service can be admitted into the United States service. It is against the policy of the Federal Government to enforce a draft at a military post, and no draftee of any grade can enter upon any extraordinary occasions for temporary purposes, and then only by order of the Commanding-General of the Department."

PEDDLERS.—"A Patent Carriage Company, U.S.," has been formed in Connecticut for the purpose of bringing into use country novel improvements. The framework is of hickory, wicker, by using this several inches of space are saved, and also the accommodation, they say, of packages in ordinary cabs or of wood, in these new ones are of papier mache, or paper pressed into moulds, it is softer and very tough. Every part of a cab usually of wood, being so in the instance under review. The springs are beneath the body, which brings the wheels free, hence there is no ordinary vibration, and this gives additional room in the width. The window runs down by the door, as in coupés, and over the door is a sash, and there is a sash door, which may be pushed down, and the door itself below the sash is glass. The ventilation is also improved. One style of Hansom has a leg rest, and this, and the one above named, can be provided. The cost of vehicles is said to be considerably reduced. The new cabs are called Peddlers.

ON THE ORIGIN AND ANTIQUITY OF PLAYING CARDS.—They are divided into 4 seasons or quarters, the pack of cards into 4 suits, each suit into 13 cards, each card into 4 marks, each mark into 13 points, 52 weeks, each pack of cards, 4 seasons, 52 suits, 365 points, and counting honors in taking the knave for 11, the queen for 12, and the king for 13, the number of families, months, and days in the year. The invention of his letters, he says, apologetically "I have, indeed, remained a long time without invention in writing, the time which I spend in playing at cards, but another motive induces me to throw my writings into the world, that the soul is immortal; why, then, should I not wish a trifling of little time, seeing that you have a whole eternity before you?"

We would call special attention to R. T. Hayward's advertisement, in another department of this issue. Our gallant troops in the Union service can obtain from him every desirable article of Uniform, Regimental, Brigade, Division or Corps Fine, Badges or Emblems. As a very patriot pride himself on his particular Company, Regiment or Corps, and wishes to decorate his manly breast with so honorable Badge, designated by the emblems and initials, we would say, in addition to the above, we take pleasure in referring them to Mr. Hayward's advertisement, in which will be found all that is desired in that line. Mr. Hayward is one of our largest and oldest Manufacturing Jewellers, and is the leading manufacturer of the Army Badges. In fact, his is the only reliable house to deal with. He can be relied upon for quality of prices, promptness and faithfulness in filling all orders. Our "Masonic" friends will also find everything in their line appertaining to MASONRY and Home Journals.

THE MARRYING MAN!

A NOVEL,

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE JILT," &c., &c.

"THE MARRYING MAN" is certainly one of the most amusing and unique productions that has been issued for some time, and the story of total ruination, and consequent absorption of Old Barridge, though perhaps a little over-wrought, is a humorously graphic picture of the sentimental cobalt of the character of Osmond Delbridge, and his amiable and refreshing contrast.—Bell's Weekly Messenger.

Dr. Talbot's Concentrated Medical

is a PREVENTIVE of SICKNESS. The experience that Dr. Talbot has had for the last Twenty-five years as a physician in this city, has fully convinced him of the truth that will prevent sickness. The article offered is Dr. Talbot's Medicated Pineapple Cider, designed for the classes, old and young. It is not new to the Doctor, but is now offered to the public. Our quiet habits will lead a well person one year. This is rather a new mode of living—nevertheless, it is a healthful one. Without sickness. It is better to pay three dollars a year to keep well, than to pay ten times that sum to Doctors, in doctor's bills, and so much more for the loss of time and the inconvenience of sickness. Directions accompanies use as follows: Add one teaspoonful of Medicated Pineapple Cider to a tumbler of cold water, and drink the first thing after you rise in the morning, and the same to-day you retire at night. It will assist the digestion and give vigor and action to the system. A celebrated New York physician has said that he would prefer to use the Pineapple Cider, assures Dr. Talbot that he gained a few pounds of flesh in one month's use. Dr. Talbot's confidence in me as above directed, and finds it very beneficial; says it has proved an entire preventive to sickness in his case. Also, another well-known gentleman in New York has used the Doctor's cider constantly for ten years, and has not been sick one day during that time.

Price $3 per bottle (full quart); pints, $2; half-pints, $1. One dozen bottle, one gallon. Sent by express or half pint bottle, sent free by Express on receipt of price. Orders addressed to the Doctor,

ARRANDALE & CO., Manufacturers' Agents,
No. 167 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Announce that all the above list of goods will be sold for One Dollar each.

In consequence of the great stagnation of trade in the manufacturing districts of England, through the war in America, and the recent action, taken by Parliament in Valuable Jewellery, originally intended for the English Market, we have been sent off four ships' loads of goods, and MUST BE SOLD AT ANY SACRIFICE!

United Stores Commissioners, ARRANDALE & Co., acting as Agents for the principal European Manufactories, have determined upon a Great Sale of Jewellery, upon the following regulations:

Descriptive Lists of various articles are first put into envelopes, sealed up and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out promiscuously, and sent to every Certificate, thus giving all a fair chance.

On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you are to have, and then it is at your option to send the dollar and take the article. Or you can purchase more than one, and obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, or any Set of Jewellery mentioned in the Certificate.

Send 25 Cents for Certificates.

In all transactions by mail, we will charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage and doing the business; but parties wishing to be employed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10, and a hundred for $15.

Agents.—We want agents in every regiment, and in every town and county in the country, and those acting for us will be allowed one certificate free for every one ordered for them, provided their remittances amounts to such; and parties can act as agents for one or more Certificates, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage Stamps.

167 Broadway, New York.

What the "Press" say of Us.

GREAT GIFT DISTRIBUTION.—A rare opportunity is offered for obtaining watches, chains, diamond rings, silverware, &c., by Messrs. Arrandale & Co., of 167 Broadway. They have an immense stock of articles, ranging in value from $1 to $100, and for $1 each distribution is very fairly done—you agree to take a certificate at that price, which informs you what you are not required to pay your dollar unless you are satisfied that the article you receive is worth the worth more than that amount, and may be $10 or $100. An excellent idea.—The Sun, New York, Feb. 15, 1865.

Messrs. Arrandale & Co.'s system has long been personally known to us, and we believe them to be every way worthy of patronage.—Saturday Evening Mail, Boston, Mass.

Messrs. Arrandale & Co., the office of Arrandale & Co.'s Agency for European Manufacturing Jewellery, a large quantity of valuable goods, consisting of watches, &c., of the newest patterns. We also noticed a large quantity of silver-plated goods, manufactured by the same firm, and newly-imported articles are to be disposed of on a novel and interesting plan, giving great scope for business, and affording extensive employment to agents. We know that the enterprise of Messrs. Arrandale will speedily and thoroughly worthy of public confidence, and recommend our readers to give them a favorable call.—Saturday Press, New York, Sept. 3, 1864.

Messrs. Arrandale & Co.'s arrangement, the advantages must be on the side of the customer, for he is sure to receive a valuable article for a comparatively trifling sum. He knows what he will get for his dollar before-hand, and can act accordingly. We have examined the list, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage Stamps.—New York Weekly Times, Aug. 6, 1864.

Messrs. Arrandale & Co. have the most eligible and profitable employment we have heard of for ladies in search of employment. Their office is at 167 Broadway. Mr. Arrandale & Co. A lady of our acquaintance has been employed by them, and has found it not only a source of profit, but she is doing a good turn to those to whom she sells Arrandale's Certificates.—Saturday Evening Mail, Boston, Mass.

In our columns the reader will find an advertisement of Arrandale & Co., who are introducing a novel system of jewellery and silver-ware. In payment of that advertisement we are favored with the jewelry and silver-ware, and we are warranted in saying that, both in finish and quality, they quite exceed our expectations. They turned out to be just what they had been represented.—True Democrat (Louisiana), Aug. 31, 1864.

The British Whig of Kingston, C. W., says, Nov. 26, 1864, one of our lady subscribers became an agent for Arrandale & Co., and by request brought some 20 articles, sent as prizes for the agency, to the office for inspection, and without hesitation we can state that each and EVERY ONE of the articles brought across the threshold of our office to the recipients, and some of them six times.

The cases of this watch are entirely new invention, composed of six different metals combined, rolled together and planished, producing an exact imitation of 18 carat gold, called Arcana, which will always keep its color. They are as beautiful and durable as solid gold, and are offered at one-fifth the cost. The case is beautifully designed, with Pistol and Shield for name, with Patent Push Pin, and engraved in the exact style of the celebrated Gold Hunting Levers, and are really handsomer and more durable, and not an imitation of gold, as to duty detector. The movement is manufactured by the well-known Sol. Hoyt Company of Europe, and are superbly finished, having engraved plates, fancy curved bridges, adjusting Segment, with gold balance, and the improved ruby jewelled action, with fine dial and delicate hands; and is warranted a good timekeeper. These watches are of three different sizes, the smallest being for ladies, and are all Hunting Cases. A case of six will be sent by mail or Express for $15. A single one sent in an Octagon Morocco Case for $3, will readily sell for three times their cost. We are the sole agents for this watch in the United States, and none are genuine which do not bear our Trade Mark.

NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1864, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 469—Vol. XX.] NEW YORK, APRIL 22, 1865. [Price 10 Cents. $4 00 Yearly 13 Weeks $1 00.

The Death Blow of the Rebellion.

"Now let the kettle to the trumpet speak,
The trumpet to the cannoneer without,
The cannon to the heavens, the heavens to earth."

The news of the fall of Richmond has already reverberated throughout the whole wide expanse of our land, and a hundred rapid keels are carrying it to expectant nations beyond the seas. An event by no means unexpected, its realization, nevertheless, to the occasion of a joy and satisfaction equally universal and profound. Richmond, for the possession of which we have so long struggled, had become not only the symbol of the rebellion, but the centre and citadel of its strength. Within the grim circle of its fortifications, bristling with cannon, it held the head of the so-called Confederacy, its government and the flower of its army. Its importance was forcibly but not extravagantly set forth in an article in the Richmond Examiner (we print a portion in another connection), in which it was spoken of as "the central point in all the plans and exertions" of the two contestants in the war, of which its capture will prove the great and final act. Its loss, it was declared, would prove not only "material ruin to the Southern cause, but in a moral point of view absolutely destructive, crushing the heart and extinguishing the last hope of the country." It is but little over a month since these ominous and momentous words were written and printed, and to-day the hand that penned them is palsied in death, the establishment in which they were printed is a heap of ashes, and Richmond has passed from under rebellious sway for ever. The Congress that for so long a period held high and defiant debate within its walls has dissolved to meet no more, and the army that boasted its capacity to hold the city for a century, defeated, dispirited and dwindled to less than half its proportion, has fallen into the generous hand of Grant.

The head and heart of the rebellion are alike crushed—Richmond and Charleston! Mobile is the only town of importance that remains in the whole so-called "Confederacy," and we are prepared, at any moment, to hear of its surrender under the heavy persuasions of Canby's and Granger's guns. And Johnston's already beaten army, we may expect to hear that that too has been swept like chaff before Sherman, and scattered to the winds. The "Confederacy," which sprang into full armed and parricidal existence four years ago, may be considered dead, and the fourth anniversary of the lowering the brave old flag on Sumter will witness no organised force of insurgents in the field capable for a moment of resisting the National authority. Thus much is assumed by the fall of Richmond, and the subsequent dispersion of Lee's army.

Four years! In that brief space how much has been crowded! What events of arms on sea and land! The continent has trembled under the tread of two millions of combatants, and the shores of ocean still quiver with the thunders of the most powerful navy that ever floated on its bosom. And how, over thousands of miles, the hills and valleys are furrowed with fortifications, and hillow with the mounds that mark the graves of the dead! Change, not material alone, but more stupendous in its moral than in its physical aspects. The nation has been nationalised; four millions of slaves have been made freemen, and the sole irreconcilable element in our Republican organization has been purged from our discordances. The fugitive negro who only a few years ago was dragged through Boston, and forced by Massachusetts' favorite hack into bondage, to-day hears an honorable discharge in the name of the Union, and enrolls his former companions in service for the defence of the flag now happily washed, albeit in blood, of its early stains. Wondrous change, and yet how glorious! How brightly the sun shines to-day on a restored and regenerated country! How lightly to-day beats the hearts of the lovers of liberty and the friends of Republican institutions!

The End!

Gen. Lee surrendered himself and the rebel army under him, unconditionally to Lieut.-Gen. Grant on the 9th of April. The terms offered by Gen. Grant, and accepted by Gen. Lee, are as follows:

"Rolls of all the officers and men to be made in duplicate, one copy to be given to an officer designated by me, the other to be retained by such officers or you may designate.

"The officers to give their individual parades not to take arms against the Government of the United States until properly exchanged, and each company or regimental commander sign a like parole for the men of their command.

"The arms, artillery and public property to be parked and stacked, and turned over to the officers appointed by me to receive them.

"This will not embrace the side arms of the officers, nor their private horses or baggage.

"This done, officers and men will be allowed to return to their homes, not to be disturbed by United States authority so long as they observe their parole and the laws in force where they may reside."

The Commander-in-Chief of the rebel forces of the South, and its only organized army worthy of the name, has yielded to the power of the United States as wielded by its Lieutenant-General. The war is over, and to him opposed is thanks to Gen. Grant and his gallant army in the following terms:

"Thanks be to Almighty God for the victory with which He has blessed your arms, and for the generous terms under your command.

"The United States Government, and of the Government and of the People of the United States—in recognition and admiration of your valor, devotion and endurance you and the brave and gallant officers and soldiers of your army for all time.

This is the end of the rebellion, and the statues of Peace lights up the whole heavens. The strength of the Republic has been proved, its integrity vindicated, and it now starts out on a new career of grandeur and glory, free from the moral disease that cankered its vitals and so nearly destroyed its existence. We have only room to append the initialed noble letter of Gen. Grant to the rebel commander proposing his surrender. It is worthy of the great fame of its author:

CITY POINT, VA., April 7, 1865.

GEN. R. E.—Commanding C. S. A.

GENERAL—The result of the last week must convince you of the hopelessness of further resistance on the part of the Army of Northern Virginia in this struggle. I feel that it is my duty, and myself to say to you that further effusion of blood, by either of you to compel a surrender of that portion of the Southern Army known as the Army of Northern Virginia.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

U. S. GRANT, Lieut.-Gen.

Canada.

The termination of the Reciprocity Treaty between the United States and Canada, but more particularly the termination of the convention between the United States and Great Britain, as to the naval armament on the lakes, were interpreted in England as evidence of hostility to Canada on that country. Whereas the true cause of the termination of the treaty consisted in the fact that it was not reciprocal, and was to be eminently disadvantageous to the United States. The termination of the convention consisted in the fact that Canada was either unwilling or unable to maintain her part of the agreement, and upon which parasitical organizations to be made within her borders to prey on American commerce in the lakes. Self-interest, the potency and legitimate object of all international acts, and the instinct of self-preservation, which none will deny, were at the bottom of both measures, and the propriety of both must forever remain unquestioned. They have been done so from the Premier of Great Britain himself, who in a recent speech, on the occasion of submitting the proposition for the confederation of the British North American Provinces, was obliged to confess, that,

"After the acts of conspiracy and violence which had taken place upon the frontier, their attention to peace, order and good government in the neighborhood demanded the utmost possible vigilance, and the exercise of the most positive powers, and the most vigorous measures. With regard to the Reciprocity Treaty, the United States considered that it was not for the benefit of the United States that it should continue; but the moment it was known that the Provincial Parliament and Government of the United States to confer a renewal of the treaty which would be mutually beneficial, and to secure advantageous and just towards the United States."

The recent decision of the Canadian courts, through which the St. Albans thieves and murderers were discharged on the ground that they were "belligerents" in the just interpretation of the terms, is the latest step to advance Canadian interests in the United States. Good neighborhood is a requisite of political as well as social organization, and perhaps in no case more than in Canada, and our hyperborean friends will be wise to conform to its requisitions. The wretched gonconcade aided by inflaming Quebec and Canada or both, as against an attack from this side, is worthy only of children or idiots. The physical strength of Canada is poorly paralleled by that of an infant when it comes to a contest with this country. Yet, saying this, we are free to add, that we have never heard of a man, woman, or child (the latter might be excepted) in the country, who desired or expected either a war with Canada or its incorporation with this country. We have enough black, worthless territory without taking in its British and Canadian swamps and wilderness, its ungenial soil, and repellent scenery, not to say its squalid population. Our nearest and best friends are those we have known, in winter weather in New York, without having them hitten off by below-zero impudent and thermy-eyed frost-gods in Montreal.

"God made Scotland," kindly suggested a blind son of Edinburgh to Dr. Johnson, after one of his strides against Scotchmen. "Yes, sir," was the response, "and God made Scotchmen; but He made it all in a fog and a hell, sir." We do not attempt the application, and we do not want Canada.

By far the ablest of the Richmond editors was Mr. Daniel, who had formerly been Minister to Sardinia during the administrations of Pierce and Buchanan. He was a bold, vigorous, trenchant writer, with a fine command of English and rich in historical illustrations. He died only three days before the fall of Richmond, and was thus spared the mortification of witnessing the breaking-down of that fabric of treason, of which he was one of the founders, and to the weal much of which he had contributed talents. He did not disguise from himself that the capture of Richmond would prove the death-blow to the rebel Confederate Government, the disintegration of the army, and the total destruction of the hopes of the entire Southern Confederation. The war would, after that, degenerate into a guerilla one, and although for a season will have a core to define purpose which would keep it from utter extinction, that core would be the safety of those immediately pursuing it. The force of rebellion, Gen. Lee's army, would be reduced to a ten among such as would be gone for ever. The country, the country, the safety of the lives of men and women in the land, contradicts the idea that any body of men, however resolute, however united, and however capital was abandoned, its Government set adrift, and its army thrown into confusion, could long hold out.

"It is idle to pretend that Richmond is of no more importance than Savannah, Atlanta, Mobile or Norfolk. It is true that Richmond is not a seaport, but to assert that it is not more a vital point, why has so much effort been made to secure for the Confederacy and defend it but because of the peculiar point of the country through that region and because of the influence it has upon the opinion of the world? Richmond is the capital of Virginia east of the Alleghanies, and the most important division of North Carolina. It is situated 100 miles from the sea, yet large ships can ascend from its waters. The occupation of Richmond is strong force by the enemy would necessarily drive the Confederate armies east of Virginia, and restrict all eastern North Carolina indefinitely, and, once gained by a power having command of the water, it would be difficult to dislodge it, except by a movement by the Confederates.

"Each could what the war has made Richmond the centre of all of its plans and all its sacrifices. It has become the symbol of the Confederacy. Its fall would be a moral stun to the cause, and, in a moral point of view, would be destructive, perhaps, to hope and extinguishing the last hope of the country. Our armies would lose the prestige incurred by a great and worthy object of defence. Our military policy would be changed. We should be compelled to abandon the whole extensive military organization; without a battle, without an engagement, with the means of battle in our hands, we should be compelled to surrender to the enemy the whole country, to relinquish a contest which, upon the popular mind and sentiment, is almost the same as to relinquish the war itself.

"The withdrawal of the army from Richmond into the interior, and the abandonment of the capital would be exactly to reduce our military strength. As the army would then be in the interior, its line of supply would be more rapidly contracted, and before reaching the base of supply it would be compelled to subsist upon the bodies of our own officers. From the hour of giving up the capital our military power would be reduced in a more rebellious in the estimation of foreign powers, while those who have been in the habit of looking to us for aid would be compelled to look elsewhere. Richmond is an interior and defensible, so that every effort would fight therefrom with a better moral effect."

Summary of the War.

VIRGINIA.

In our last we announced the occupation of Petersburg and Richmond by the Federal army. On Sunday, the 2th of March, Gen. Sheridan attacked the outer lines of the rebels before Petersburg, but was repulsed after a desperate struggle; but after dark the attack was renewed, and then Lee's last army was forced, the result was that during the night the rebel army evacuated both cities, and retreated with all dispatch, hoping to reach Burkeville, a station 35 miles distant, and which would enable Lee to choose either Lynchburg or Lynchburg. By forced marches, however, Gen. Sheridan reached Burkeville before the rebels, and Gen. Ord occupied that town on the 5th and 6th corps, in which battle the rebels were defeated, with great loss in men and generals.

On the 9th, after considerable skirmishing, Gen. Grant commenced the 7th, Gen. Lee formally surrendered himself and the remnant of the army of Northern Virginia.

ALABAMA.

The Federal forces have received the entire submission of Alabama. The capitulation will doubtless follow the arrival of the news of Lee's surrender.

Selma has been occupied by the National troops. It was one of the last remaining rebel depots.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Latest advices from Raleigh announce its occupation by Gen. Sherman. Gen. Stoneman, also commanding a column of troops, had left Danville and Greensboro railway.

NEW BOOKS, MUSIC, &c.

THE HILTONS AND THE HUTTONS: A Story of Border Life. By WILLIAM GILMORE SIMMS, author of "Guy Rivers," etc. Boston: Tickner & Fields.

Another reprinted novel of this delightful author, whose fine descriptive powers are a reminder of the spacious writings of his brother Cheever. The plot is a simple one, a conflict of the borderers daily to a border war, is busy, and has already won admiration from the best English critics.

CROQUET: Laws of the Game, etc., by JOHN JAQUES. Published by A. Williams & Co., Boston, from the 14th London edition.

This is a plain and thorough explanation of the now popular game, with all its rules and illustrations. Mailed to any address for $1, postage free.

TOWN GOSSIP.

AH, have we got you at last? It is no butterfly we have been chasing through a June garden, no bright-winged fairy to escape from our clutches and sinister purse, be it like the tooth of a viper, and the wing of a bat, and the thirst of a spider, and is, on the whole, a very ugly customer as to shape, face, and a parable to know what to do with. This Jefferson Davis is the subject we have got on his own subjects, his own children as he would call them. What does he discover? Over a fair and wealthy land he has escaped the wrath of God and retired under the sun, and the people sit in a great darkness, and saw all the glories of the world. At the bidding of the evil pinions is turned back from our town after another, what do we see in them all? The child murdered, the old man robbed, the woman betrayed at home under their lords ravishing, hand black animals their healthiest society for the worst. As the hideous truth is every brought upon many thousands of people accustomed to the habits and demands of old refinement, the nature of this country—"a nature or a second nature"—he hearts burn within us we read? These people, after reading the Jefferson Philadelphia and Davis, as he systematically lured and starved and bled, for the sole purpose of feeding and gratifying his own ambition. Such a monstrous, monstrous, monstrous fiend! If this chief, often took of tears so nine as splendid with temper and his own people, and to infatuate and make slaves to his side, have broken their golden hearts over his business, with breaking fidelity to a hopeless cause, and to a hopeless chief, has absolved from all care and their pain he has had no mercy; very long after it has ceased to be a question of duty nor sacrifice he has used their precious lives as a wall behind which he has sheltered and crawled away.

Such are the wretched armies and those hapless tribes is now owing the grassmound forgiveness of a victorious country, and a magnanimous foe. But what is the fault the brothers who have estranged themselves from us, and who are now left out in the cold, to suffer the penalty of their own history. Let the Palm Sunday which saw the surrender of the Arch Traitor's political army open for ever the gates of the sanctuary to all but the palm's toughest meanings of victory and peace.

Meanwhile, as the poor deluded, the arch interest topples over towards his grave, two genuine monsters and men of note have arisen, from graves that will not close, and whose appearance is a source of speculation. It is in the walks of literature that they are gibing. Both are equally of the dead, and we are all crowding around to see.

First the renowned Judas, led forward by the Cable Company, and whose name has been for many years tattooed the list of the old Roman inn, has declared what he has been doing since he betrayed his master, and through them the spurs of life—his "Life of Cesar." The revealing at the bidding of the company is, as every one will remember, to have appeared in the form of a great biography, and a work of genius, which plays to be called "Cesar." Judas has simply come forward to confess his own character. Judas, by treachery as well as and the terrible indictment therefore, to which he pleads guilty, without excuse, and with the air of the criminal as they may, in answering allegation, "Yes, I have been a traitor, I have betrayed my friend and my sympathy," and not content with having such the immortal blasphemer, unable to bear it, drops the pen and the manner of the writer, and closes his entire with a policeman's baton, shoulder weapon, and smacking of old associations by any less Belgium.

The least in a sketch of Augustus. Under the most exquisite ballet, our satirist repeats the grossest conditions and evident fate of Frisco.

"Thirteen years that seven years later, at the death of Augustus, there were few citizens who had seen the Republic of their youth, and who survived it; they had been carried off by the civil wars, or by proscriptions, or by assassinations, or by imprisonment, or by exile, or by misery, or by despair; time had done the rest; there remained only a few bitter spirits, a few morose old men; and as those who had come into the world since Actium had been born with the image of the Emperor in their eyes (and yet saw no better), there was ground for hoping that they would be disposed to find the new state of things the best of all, since they had never seen any other. Thus the herd of Remus was contented; and all was for the best in the best of empires."

As to the taste of the thing—an Imperial author publishing, and inviting criticism and the "honest truth"—all that is summarily disposed of:

"The book of Augustus is his life elevated into an example, his ambition made innocent, his will formulated into law, it is the code of the malefactors, the bible of the rascals; and it is such a book that you wish to criticise publicly under the rule of his good pleasure. What! the wretch who assassinates you makes a sermon to you upon assassination, and before finishing he asks your opinion upon his little composition—yes, your sincere opinion upon the form and spirit, your political and literary opinion; for he is an artist and a good fellow, and he wants to know your opinion on his work; and you really are going to tell it him, and while his knife is on your throat you will politely converse with the executioner."

The other royal apparition is Friedrich II., "called Frederick the Great," now finally and completely galvanized into life by the voltaic Mr. Carlyle. He stands resuscitated upon his six finished volumes, and the London critics are praising and contemplating. Now Carlyle is no great favorite of ours. His uncouth and wrong-headed strength is applied upon no principle, without it be the bolstering-up of some demigod as wrong as himself, and quite superior to his support. He is a sly and obstinate Caliban, biting at most things, but always falling at the feet of some truculent Trinculo or other, and beslavering him with his gibberish:

"Hast thou not dropped from Heaven?"

Carlyle can see nothing heroic in our own war, since no man has arisen positively great and overbearing, like a Cæsar, and grasped the quarrel in his hands. His opinions play easily into the doctrines of the author of "La Vie de César," both men worshipping bare Ability, and considering it paramount. In these half-flippant terms the Scotchman throws off the conclusion of what he had to say about the hero of the seven years' war:

"I define him to myself as hitherto the Last of the Kings; when the Next will be is a very long question! But it seems to me as if the Nations—probably all nations, by-and-bye, in their despair—blinded, swallowed like Jonah in such a whale's belly of thin e brutish, waste, abominable (for is not anarchy, or the rule of what is Baser over what is Nobler, the one life's misery worth complaining of, and, in fact, the abomination of abominations, springing from and producing all others whatsoever?)—as if the nations universally, and England too if it hold on, may more and more bethink themselves of such a Man and his Function and Performance, with feelings far other than are possible at present. Meanwhile, all I had to say of him is finished; that, too, it seems, was a bit of work appointed to be done. Adieu, good readers; bad also, adieu!"

The extract shows the general character of Carlyle's conclusions, and indicates the peculiar mannerism of his style, which is even more Carlyleish than usual in these closing chapters of his greatest work.

What with the claims of events and books upon the attention, we have had little time for the theatres. On Monday, however, we did get within the walls of Niblo's to see the performance of "King Lear," by the vast Sylvanus.

In many respects this is the greatest Lear on the stage. The following questions are asked with a mild propitiating sigh, with extreme meekness, and without the least expectation of an answer:

Were the ancient kings of Briton given to such inarticulate snarlings? Did they provide expression for their faces by lifting one eyebrow away up into their caps and letting the other down over the cheek? Did they prolong their vowels quite so sonorously? When overtaken by mania did they crown themselves with bushel baskets? Did they make a great display of muscle at the age of ninety or thereabouts? But on the other hand, were any of them poets enough to deliver passages like the curse, or the interview with Tom O'Bedlam, with the ideal majesty, tempered with human sadness, which Niblo's heard that night?

Mr. Owens gracefully retires from the stage of the Broadway Theatre on Monday and following evenings, to afford a parenthesis of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean, who are playing an engagement of eleven nights, on the conclusion of which Owens will re-appear. During Monday last the choice of seats and private boxes was disposed of by auction. Mr. and Mrs. Kean commenced with "Henry VIII." and "The Jealous Wife."

The ever fresh Mrs. John Wood has been raising a breeze among the Olympians by her racy impersonation of Lady Gay and other favorite characters.

On Wednesday there was an immense matinée entertainment at the Academy, for the annual benefit of the Theatrical Mechanical Association, all the principal theatrical companies participating.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The managers of the New York Inebriate Asylum have concluded, after trial, that they cannot cure a drunkard in less than a year.

—— While a rebel guard was patroling near Fayetteville, N. C., a Federal negro stole up and leaped on his back, holding him a prisoner. The victim exerted himself desperately, but the negro wasn't to be thrown off his guard!

—— The monument to the memory of Addison G. Whitney and Luther C. Ladd of the 6th Massachusetts, who were killed when that regiment passed through Baltimore to defend the National Capital, will be dedicated with appropriate ceremonies on the 19th of April. The structure is 27½ feet high.

—— The new half-handkerchief style of bonnet is thus described in an exchange:

"A sort of cup to catch the hair,
Leaving the head to 'go it bare,'
A striking example of 'nothing to wear,'
Is this bonnet abomination."

Again:

"It makes a woman look brazen and bold,
Assists her in catching nothing but cold;
It is bad on the young, absurd on the old,
And deforms what it ought to deck."

—— A remarkable change of population is going forward in Missouri; the old secesh citizens are leaving the State, not for the South, but for places in the West where they are less known, and their places are filled by emigrants from the Eastern and Central States. There is great activity in land sales, and Missouri is already feeling the impulse of freedom.

—— The population of Nashville is now estimated at 75,000, or more than double what it was before the rebellion.

—— The name of Illinois is said to have originated as follows. A party of Frenchmen set out upon an exploring expedition down the river, which they afterwards named, providing themselves with bark canvas, and relying chiefly for their subsistence upon the game. They found at the confluence of the river with the Mississippi an island thickly wooded with black walnut. It was at a season of the year when the nuts were ripe, and this party of explorers, encamped upon the island, greatly enjoyed the luxury of this fruit. From this circumstance they called the island the "island of nuts"—or, in French, "Isle aux nois," which name was given to the river which they explored, and thence to the territory and State. This explanation of the word "Illinois" more fully accords with the orthography of the word, which has certainly a French termination—and the rapid pronunciation of the French "Isle aux nois" would naturally lead to the Anglicism of the term into its present shape, "Illinois."

—— Gov. Fenton has appointed Friday, 14th of April, as a general Thanksgiving Day for the State of New York.

—— Gov. Fenton has nominated Samuel Sloan, C. Pinckney, James W. Booth and Martin B. Brown, for Fire Commissioners, under the new law.

—— Peter Cooper writes a letter warmly approving the new Fire Department Law, and returning his thanks to the Senate and Assembly for passing it. He says: "There is nothing, in my opinion, that will so effectually aid us to bring about a good government in our city as a law that will join in one body the Police and Fire Department, and make it the dollar and cent interest of the whole body to faithfully perform their duty."

—— Collector Draper, in a speech in Wall street, the other day, to an immense crowd, alluding to a rebel prophecy in the early part of the war, warned the assemblage to "get from off the grass in Wall street."

—— The long-talked-of work on the Southern war of independence from the pen of that famous lady, "Belle Boyd," now the wife of Mr. Hardinge, living in London, is soon to be published.

—— In a Sunday school, the other day, while the recitation of verses of Scripture was in progress, a little lad suddenly exclaimed: "I know a verse!" He was desired to recite it, and did so, thus: "If any one attempts to haul down the American flag shoot him on the spot."

—— William Cullen Bryant has purchased the homestead of Welcome and Cyrus Tillson, of Cummington, Mass., and will occupy it as a summer residence. Mr. Bryant is a native of Cummington.

—— Jedediah Huntington, 2d, of Norwich, Ct., is the possessor of the original letter sent by Major André, of the British army, to Gen. Washington, asking that he might be shot rather than hanged.

—— The entire net receipts of the Philadelphia Sanitary Fair were $1,035,098.

—— In Essex street, Newburyport, where there are only 14 houses, there are now living six ladies whose united ages are 503 years. They are all over 75, and the oldest, 96, is the oldest person in the city, but in good health and quite active.

—— The Maryland Legislature has repealed nearly all the old acts of that State, oppressive to the colored population which used to be so cruelly enforced. Among them were the laws "prohibiting meetings of negroes for religious purposes unless conducted by a white person;" "prohibiting trade with free negroes;" "prohibiting the navigation of vessels by negroes," and "prohibiting negroes from keeping a dog or a gun without a licence."

—— Ciprian Risaud is worth over a million of dollars, and is the richest colored man in the United States. The colored men in New York have many rich men, among them Peter Vandyke, Robert Watson, J. M. Gloucester and Mr. Crosby, who own about $3,000,000 in property, real estate and otherwise.

—— Mr. George Thompson said, in a speech at Cambridge, that "the rail-splitter had turned out better than the union-splitter."

—— A lawyer in a New York court, a day or two since, objected to the continuance of a case, on the ground that his witnesses came from a foreign country, and that it would be difficult again to secure their attendance. The witnesses, it appeared, were from New Jersey. Poor New Jersey! The State gets all the kicks, and the owners of the State, Camden and Amboy, get all the coppers.

Personal.—Secretary Seward, while driving out with his family, on the 5th of April, was thrown from his carriage and seriously injured.

—— Mrs. Lincoln left Washington on the 5th of April to join the President at City Point. She will visit Richmond with him.

—— Garibaldi's daughter, Teresita, has lately given birth to a son, who has been christened Lincoln, at the express wish of the great Liberator. It is supposed to be a compliment for Mr. Lincoln liberating the slaves.

—— Calvert Comstock, editor of the Albany Atlas some ten years ago, and since that joint editor and proprietor (with Mr. Cassidy) of the Atlas and Argus, has retired from the editorial chair and the paper, in consequence of continued ill-health.

—— Mrs. Oviedo (Miss Bartlett) of "Diamond Wedding" fame, is lying ill with smallpox at her residence, near Havana. When the last steamer left (March 29) she was in an extremely critical condition.

—— The rumored insanity of the celebrated tenor Signor Giuglini is confirmed by private letters received in this city. The unfortunate man is said to be a raving maniac, and is now the inmate of a lunatic asylum.

—— Gen. Grant, in a letter to his father, nearly a fortnight before the capture of Richmond, says: "We are now having fine weather (March 24), and I think we will be able to wind up matters about Richmond soon. I am anxious to have Lee hold on where he is a short time longer, so that I can get him into a position where he must lose a great portion of his army. The rebellion has lost its vitality, and if I am not much mistaken, there will be no rebel army of any great dimensions a few weeks hence.

—— A wealthy Tennessee widow having married the rebel Gen. Ewell, all her property was confiscated by the Federal authorities in that State. Upon the matter being brought before President Lincoln, he rescinded the decision, and restored the property to the lady.

Obituary.—Among the recent distinguished dead we have to number Sir Robert Schomburgh, who died at Berlin, Prussia, March 11. It will be remembered that, after his famous explorations in British Guiana, Sir Robert was appointed British Consul in St. Domingo, and afterwards Consul-General in Siam. He returned last year to Europe, and has passed the whole winter in Berlin, confined to his bed. In consequence of a circular issued by Dr. Barth, the African traveller, as President of the Berlin Geographical Society, his funeral was attended by a large number of scientific men. He leaves behind him a solid scientific reputation.

—— Hon. William C. Crain died at Herkimer, N. Y., on the 16th March, aged 67. He was Speaker of the Assembly in 1846, and the Democratic candidate for Lieutenant-Governor in 1860, and always enjoyed the confidence and friendship of the leading men of that party.

—— James L. Langworthy, who emigrated from Vermont to Iowa, in 1828, before the Indians had relinquished possession, died in Dubuque, a few days ago, aged 65 years. In 1830 he obtained a claim, for $700, to most of the land upon which the city of Dubuque now stands.

—— John M. Daniel, the editor of the Richmond Examiner, died in that city on the 1st of April—the last issue of the paper as a rebel sheet.

Foreign.—The Empress Eugenie has written to the Queen of England and the Sovereigns in Europe, proposing that, without distinction of creed, all shall join at once for the purpose of effecting a suitable restoration of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem, which is now a state of utter disrepair.

—— Last year England imported 893,304,720 pounds of cotton—a large increase over the amount of 1862 and 1863. About the same amount was received in Great Britain in 1855.

—— The importation of African negroes into Cuba has averaged from 20,000 to 30,000 per annum, and this in spite of the combined efforts of the leading commercial nations, and the claims of innocence on the part of Spain in her own behalf. Another movement is taking place in the Spanish Cortes to remedy the troubles.

—— The chief of the Paris branch of Rothschild's banking house has lately presented the little daughter of Prince Metternich, Austrian ambassador at Paris, with a doll, which is just as large as the child, and has furnished this gift with a princely trousseau. Nothing was wanting, and the most costly laces of Paris and Alençon were to be found in whole pieces. Among other things there are mentioned 12 dozen of handkerchiefs, each of which has a value of $100, and a necklace valued at 10,000 francs.

—— In 1840 the annual mortality of Paris was one person in 28; in 1863 it was only one in 40, and this great amelioration, notwithstanding an increase of inhabitants, is ascribed to improved sanitary arrangements, the extension and widening of thoroughfares, the opening of parks and the planting of trees. Paris, with a population of 1,693,141, possesses over 5,000 acres of open ground, planted with more than 1,000,000 of trees.

—— A new Order, entitled "The Mexican Eagle," has been created by the Emperor Maximilian. Twelve grand crosses have been awarded to the Emperor Napoleon, the Emperors of Austria and Russia, and the Kings of Belgium, Sweden, Norway and Italy.

—— An English tourist has lost his life on the cone of Vesuvius; in his effort to avoid an enormous rock shot up from the crater he rolled down the declivity, and was picked up at the spot called Pellegrini, with his ribs fractured and backbone broken.

—— The Botanic Garden at Calcutta was so much damaged by the recent cyclone, that it will take a century to replace many of the old specimens and to make the garden what it was on the eve of the storm. The garden was of great use to the country, as by its means plants were introduced, propagated and distributed all over India.

—— The British lawmakers are still uneasy about American affairs, and inquiries were made in Parliament as to steps taken to protect the property of British subjects in Southern States. The answer of Mr. Layard is hesitating and muddy; all he could say was that the Washington Government said that British subjects would find no obstruction in prosecuting claims. Some members, alluding to the probability of a war with America, declared that Great Britain was worse off now than when they began the war of 1812; that America was under great obligations to England for remaining neutral in this revolution, because if England had taken part with the Confederates, she might not only have protected Canada, but put an end to the "atrocious Monroe doctrine." Laird's last rebel ram is to be a British man-of-war. The Oesterrichische Zeitung, of Vienna, asserts that the negotiations at Washington between the agents of the Emperor Maximilian and Mr. Seward are progressing satisfactorily. It reiterates the statement that Mr. Lincoln has promised to recognise the new empire at the termination of the present war.

—— News from Havana to the 29th of March, confirms the report of the defeat and death of Marechal, the French Commandant at Vera Cruz. On his return from a pillaging expedition, while in a ravine, he was attacked by about 400 Liberals, he himself killed, and about 150 of his soldiers killed and wounded. His body was not found. Some say it was cut into small pieces and thrown away, while others say that he was buried decently by the Liberals.

—— News from Uruguay is to the middle of Feb. Montevideo was invested by a Brazilian army of 13,000 men and 20 vessels; the land defences were strong, but those of the water side were weak; they are garrisoned by about 5,000 men. While the Government was determined upon a desperate defence, the foreign residents were in a great state of alarm, mainly through fear that the powder magazine might be exploded, which would be certain to destroy nearly the entire city. The Paraguayans had taken the town of Miranda, dispersing the Brazilian garrison.

—— At Vienna, a whistler named Piccolini is whistling his way to public favor. A correspondent writes that "he is a man of middle height and an elegant exterior. He whistled with accompaniment of pianoforte, the serenade of Schubert, and the cavatina of Casta Diva from "Norma." He whistled double notes with great distinctness, and his shake was irreproachable; the sound is of the most agreeable quality, as well as in the medium as in the highest part of the register. His intonation was never at fault, and one might be led to suppose that he was listening now to the song of the nightingale, now to the full and sonorous voice of the quail, and anon to the trill of the lark, as it soars into the higher regions of the empyrean. The success of the whistler was emphatic."

—— A book on Vagabonds, by M. Mario Proth, has been published in Paris. The first vagabond mentioned in the book is the Wandering Jew. Humboldt is included as a scientific vagabond.

—— Napoleon has paid the Imperial printing office 11,700 francs for revises and corrections of the first volume of his "Cæsar."

—— When copies of the Emperor Napoleon's recent speech reached the prisoners, a most curious scene took place at the Debtors' Prison at Clichy. The passage relating to the bill proposed by the Emperor for the abolition of imprisonment for debt created so much enthusiasm among the inmates that a spontaneous illumination of every window of the house startled the jailors, who vainly remonstrated against this demonstration.

—— There has been an excitement in Florence about a reported treasure hidden in the walls of the famous Riccardi palace, an edifice erected in 1470. The walls were explored and researches made beneath the pavements of the immense vaults of the palace, but not only no treasure was discovered, but no sign of any place where it could possibly be hidden.

—— Since 1860 no less than 7,000 brigands have been killed, wounded or captured in Italy.

—— A Paris paper gives some curious particulars of the idiosyncracies of certain artists. Patti, for instance, is said to be always drinking beer; Mario smokes till he drives the impresario into a frenzy; Borghi-Mamo comes off from an interview with her royal lover, and immediately recruits herself with snuff. Talma used to shake his valet for five minutes, so as to get up a "wild air" before he went on and told the audience that he had seen the ghost of his departed father.

—— The immense country of Central Asia, extending from the sea of Aral to Lake Yesichkul, has been formed into Russian provinces, under the title of Russian Turkistan.

Chit-Chat.—The last sensation in Paris is the death of the Duke de Morny, half-brother to Louis Napoleon, and between whom great affection existed. The London Court Journal is assured that the Duchess de Morny, in the excess of her grief at her loss, had her beautiful hair shaved off her head. It is stated that the duke's brain weighed 1,522 grammes, being 232 grammes above the average weight. The statement that he has left memoirs to be published 10 years hence suggests the curious remark that this year, 1865, is the last of the term of 20 years fixed by Talleyrand for the publication of his reminiscences.

—— The Quarterly Review denies that Boston is the hub of the Universe, claiming that position for Great Britain.

THE THREE WISHES.

The eastern origin of this tale seems evident; had it been originally composed in a northern land, it is probable that the king would have been represented as dethroned by means of bribes obtained from his own treasury. In an eastern country the story-teller who invented such a just termination of his narrative would, most likely, have experienced the fate intended for his hero, as a warning to others how they suggested such treasonable ideas. Herr Simrock, however, says it is a German tale; but it may have had its origin in the east for all that. Nothing is more difficult indeed than to trace a popular tale to its source; Cinderella, for example, belongs to nearly all nations; even among the Chinese, a people so different to all European nations, there is a popular story which reads almost exactly like it. Here is the tale of the Three Wishes.

There was once a wise emperor who made a law, that to every stranger who came to his court a fried fish should be served. The servants were directed to take notice, if, when the stranger had eaten the fish to the bone on one side, he turned it over and began on the other side. If he did, he was to be immediately seized, and on the third day thereafter he was to be put to death. But, by a stretch of imperial clemency, the culprit was permitted to utter one wish each day, which the emperor pledged himself to grant, provided it was not to spare his life. Many had already perished in consequence of this edict, when, one day, a count and his young son presented themselves at court. The fish was served as usual, and when the count had removed all the fish from one side, he turned it over, and was about to commence on the other, when he was suddenly seized and thrown into prison, and was told of his approaching doom. Sorrow-stricken, the count's young son besought the emperor to allow him to die in the room of his father; a favor which the monarch was pleased to accord him. The count was accordingly released from prison, and his son was thrown into the cell in his stead. As soon as this had been done, the young man said to his jailers:

"You know I have the right to make three demands before I die; go and tell the emperor to send me his daughter and a priest to marry us."

The first demand was not much to the emperor's taste, nevertheless he felt bound to keep his word, and he therefore complied with the request, to which the princess had no kind of objection. This occurred in the times when kings kept their treasures in a cave, or in a tower set apart for the purpose, like the Emperor of Morocco in these days; and on the second day of his imprisonment the young man demanded the king's treasures. If his first demand was a bold one, the second was not less so; still, an emperor's word is sacred, and having made the promise, he was forced to keep it; and the treasures of gold and silver and jewels were placed at the prisoner's disposal. On getting possession of them, he distributed them profusely among his courtiers, and soon he had made a host of friends by his liberality.

The emperor began now to feel exceedingly uncomfortable. Unable to sleep, he rose early on the third morning and went, with fear in his heart, to the prison to hear what the third wish was to be.

"Now," said he to his prisoner, "tell me what your third demand is, that it may be granted at once, and you may be hung out of hand, for I am tired of your demands."

"Sire," answered his prisoner, "I have but one more favor to request of your majesty, which, when you have granted, I shall die content. It is merely that you will cause the eyes of those who saw my father turn the fish over to be put out."

"Very good," replied the emperor, "your demand is but natural, and springs from a good heart. Let the chamberlain be seized," he continued, turning to his guards.

"I, sire!" cried the chamberlain; "I did not see anything—it was the steward."

"Let the steward be seized then," said the king.

But the steward protested with tears in his eyes, that he had not witnessed anything of what had been reported, and said it was the butler. The butler declared he had seen nothing of the matter, and that it must have been one of the valets. But they protested that they were utterly ignorant of what had been charged against the count; in short, it turned out that nobody could be found who had seen the count commit the offence, upon which the princess said:

"I appeal to you, my father, as to another Solomon. If nobody saw the offence committed, the count cannot be guilty, and my husband is innocent."

The emperor frowned, and forthwith the courtiers began to murmur; then he smiled, and immediately their visages became radiant.

"Let it be so," said his majesty; "let him live, though I have put many a man to death for a lighter offence than his. But if he is not hung, he is married. Justice has been done."

Most Remarkable Case.—A most singular accident occurred in the year 1831, and which at the time created great sensation. On the 26th of February of that year, a man, named John Toylor, aged 20, a native of Prussia, was at work as a sailor on board the brig Jane, of Scarborough, then in the London Docks, and while guiding the iron pivot of the trysail mast into the mainboom, the tackle broke, and the mast, which was 39 feet long and 600 pounds weight, descended upon Toylor. The iron pivot tore off half his scalp, which fell over his face, then, striking his lower jaw, broke it and knocked him down; lastly, piercing his chest obliquely, came out in the lower part of his back, and fixed in the deck. When thus transfixed and otherwise injured, the man subsequently stated that he felt no pain. "I was in heaven," said he; nor was he at all inconvenienced during the withdrawl of the mast from his body by his fellow-seamen, but immediately afterwards experienced "unutterable agony," and at each act of inspiration the air rushed out from the wound in his chest, proving thereby that the lung was injured. He was carried to the London Hospital, where he so far recovered in five months from the effects of his severe injuries as to be able to walk a distance of some miles. He ultimately returned to his duty as a sailor, and has ever since, during a period of twenty-seven years, enjoyed, without interruption, the most excellent health.

Lord Macaulay's celebrated and most hackneyed image of the traveller from New Zealand standing on a broken arch of London Bridge to sketch the ruins of St. Paul's (and which was first used by the essayist—for he employed it more than once—in a review of Ranke's "History of the Popes," written in 1834), was derived, in the main, from Volney's "Ruins of Ancient Empires," and it is also to be found in a letter of Horace Walpolo to Mason (November, 1774), in Kirke White's poem on "Time," and in Shelley's parody on "Peter Bell." How many are there who are aware that the phrase, "The schoolmaster abroad," was originated by one who is still living among us? Yet it was first uttered by Lord Brougham in a speech delivered on January 29, 1828. "Let the soldier be abroad if he will," said the orator, "he can do nothing in this age. There is another personage—a personage less imposing in the eyes of some, perhaps insignificant. The schoolmaster is abroad, and I trust to him, armed with his primer, against the soldier in full military array." Lord Russell's exclamation, "Rest, and be thankful!" which he avowedly repeated from the inscription on a seat at the head of Glencoe, is to be found in one of Wordsworth's sonnets.

BATTLE AT BENTONVILLE, N. C.—MAJOR-GEN. MOWER, COMMANDING 1st DIVISION, 17TH CORPS, TURNING THE REBEL LEFT HALF A MILE FROM BENTONVILLE, MARCH 20.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, J. E. TAYLOR.

ENTHUSIASM IN NEW YORK CITY ON RECEIPT OF NEWS OF THE FALL OF RICHMOND—SPEECH OF HON. L. E. CHITTENDEN, LATE REGISTRAR OF THE TREASURY, FROM THE PORTICO OF THE CUSTOM-HOUSE, APRIL 3.

IT IS NOT ON THE BATTLEFIELD.

It is not on the battlefield
That I would wish to die,
Nor is it on a broken shield
I'd breathe my parting sigh;

Although a soldier knows not how
To dread a soldier's doom,
I ask no laurels for my brow,
No trophy for my tomb.

It is not that I scorn the wreath
A soldier proudly wears,
It is not that I fear the death
A soldier bravely dares;
When slaughtered comrades round me

I'd be the last to yield,
And yet I would not wish to die
Upon the battlefield.

When faint and bleeding in the fray,
Oh, still let me retain
Enough of life to crawl away,
To that sweet vale again;
For like the wounded, weary dove,
That flutters to her nest,
I fain would reach my own true love,
And die upon her breast.

WILHELM CHALLENGES HIS BROTHER-IN-LAW TO MORTAL COMBAT.

DEATH OF DESROCHES.

DESROCHES.

BY GERARD DE NERVAL.

"Nobody has known the history of the Lieutenant Desroches, who caused himself to be killed last year at the battle of Hamhergen, two months after his marriage. If this was really a suicide, may God pardon him! But certainly he who dies defending his country merits not that his action be called by such a name, whatever may have been his design."

"Then we fall back," said the doctor, "into the chapter of the capitulations of conscience. Desroches was a philosopher, decided to quit life. He was unwilling his death should be useless, and throwing himself bravely into the combat, killed as many Germans as he could, saying, 'This is the best I can do—I die content;' and crying, 'Vive l'Empereur!' received the sabre cut which struck him down. Ten soldiers of his company will attest it."

"But this was not any the less a suicide," replied Arthur. "Nevertheless, I think it would have been wrong to deny him Christian burial."

"In this way you would brand the devotion of Curtius himself. This young Roman was possibly ruined by play, unhappy in love, weary of life, who knows? But certainly it is beautiful, while intending to quit this world, to render one's death useful to others. And therefore this cannot be called a suicide, for a suicide is nothing but an act of the supremest egotism, and for this very reason is branded among men. Of what are you thinking, Arthur?"

"I am thinking of what you said just now, that Desroches, before dying, killed as many Germans as possible."

"Well?"

"These brave people have gone to give a sad testimony of the beautiful death of the lieutenant; permit me to say that this was a homicide as well as a suicide."

"Eh! Who could think thus? The Germans are our enemies."

"But are there any for a man resolved to die? At such a moment all instinct of nationality is effaced, and I suspect one thinks of no country but the other world, and of no emperor except God. But the abbé listens to us without saying anything, and, nevertheless, I hope he agrees with me. Come, abbé, tell us your opinion, and strive to place us in accord. This is an abundant source of controversy, and the history of Desroches—or rather what the doctor and I believe we know of it—would appear not less dark than the profound reasonings that have arisen between us."

"Yes," said the doctor, "Desroches, as is supposed, was very much affected by his last wound, which so much disfigured him, and possibly he surprised some grimace or heard some satire on the part of his new wife. The philosophers are sensitive. At any rate, he is dead, and voluntarily."

"Voluntarily, since you will have it so. But call not by the name of suicide the death one meets in battle; you would add a misunderstanding in words to that you possibly make in thought. One dies in battle because one meets there something which kills; not every one dies, however, who wishes to."

"No. Do you call this fatality?"

"It is my turn," interrupted the abbé, who had collected himself during this discussion. "You will, perhaps, think it strange that I combat your paradoxes or suppositions——"

"Well, well! speak at once; you know more of the matter than we, assuredly. You have lived at Bitche for a long time; they say Desroches knew you, and perhaps in confession he avowed to you——"

"In that case I would be obliged to keep silent. But nothing of the kind happened, unfortunately, although the death of Desroches was a Christian one, believe me; and I am going to recount to you the causes and circumstances of it, in order that you may perceive this was an honest man as well as a good soldier, who died at a proper time for humanity and himself, and in accordance with the will of God:"

Desroches joined his regiment at the age of fourteen years, at the time when, the greater part of the men having been killed on the frontier, our republican army was recruited from boys. Feeble in body, slender as a young girl, and pale, his comrades suffered to see him carrying a musket, beneath which his shoulder bent. You have perhaps heard say they obtained from the captain permission to shorten it by half a foot. Thus, better suited to his strength, his musket did marvels in the battles of Flanders. Later, Desroches was ordered here to Hagenau, where we—that is, where you have been carrying on the war for so long. At the time of which I am about to speak to you Desroches was in the flower of his age, and served to distinguish the regiment much better than its number or flag, for he was nearly the only one who had survived while it had been twice renewed, and he had, finally, just been named lieutenant when, at Bergheim, twenty-seven months ago, while commanding a bayonet charge, he received a cut across his entire face from a Prussian sabre. The wound was frightful. The ambulance surgeons, who had often rallied him, virgin still of a scratch after thirty combats, looked very grave when he was brought before them. If he recover, they said, the poor fellow will become helpless or an idiot.

The lieutenant was sent to Metz, to get well. The litter had gone many leagues without his knowing it. Placed in a good bed, and watched with care, it required five or six months before he could sit up, and a hundred days still ere he could open his one remaining eye or distinguish anything. Tonics were soon ordered, the sunlight, exercise, and, finally, one morning, supported by two comrades, he walked, tottering and very giddy, towards the Quai St. Vincent, which nearly touches the military hospital, where they caused him to sit down in the sunlight, beneath the trees of the public garden. The poor fellow believed he saw the day for the first time. By dint of walking thus, he could soon go alone, and each morning he seated himself on a bench at the same place on the esplanade, his head buried in a mass of black taffeta, beneath which could scarce be seen any of his face, and on his way, when encountering other promenaders, he was sure of a respectful salute from the men and a gesture of profound commiseration from the women, which, however, consoled him but little.

Once seated, he forgot his misfortune, while thinking only of his good luck in surviving such a shock, and of the pleasure he experienced in discovering in what sort of place he was. Before him the old citadel, ruined beneath Louis XVI. spread out its lowered ramparts; overhead, the trees in flower cast a thick shade; at his feet, in the valley, which was unfolded beneath the esplanade, the meadows of St. Symphorien, which the Moselle, overflowing its banks, vivifies, and which grow green between its two arms; and then a little oasis, the Isle of Saulcey, sown with shadows and thatched cottages; finally, the falls of the Moselle and its white foam, its windings glittering in the sunlight, and at last, finishing the landscape, the chain of the Vosges, blue and like thin vapor in the broad day. Such was the spectacle he admired, always more at the thought that there was his country, not the conquered land, but the province truly French, while the beauty of these rich new departments, where he had been making war, was but fugitive and uncertain, like the woman admired to-day, to-morrow no longer remembered.

It was on the first day of June, the heat was great, and the favorite seat of Desroches being well shaded, two women came and sat down near the wounded man. He bowed to them quietly, and continued to contemplate the horizon, but his condition inspired so much interest, the two women could not refrain from questioning and pitying him.

One of them, quite aged, was the aunt of the other, who was called Emilie, and whose occupation was to embroider ornaments of gold on silk or velvet. Desroches questioned in his turn, and the aunt apprised him that the young girl had quitted Hagenau in order to keep her company, that her embroidery was for the churches, and that long since she had lost all her other relatives.

The next day the bench was occupied as before, and at the end of a week there was a treaty of alliance between the three proprietors of this favorite bench; and Desroches, feeble as he was, humiliated by the attentions the young girl lavished on him, as on some inoffensive old man, Desroches felt himself in good spirits, disposed to jest, and more ready to rejoice than be sorry at his unexpected good fortune.

Then, on his return to the hospital, he remembered his frightful wound, this scarecrow at which he had often internally groaned, but which habit and his convalescence had long since rendered to him less deplorable.

It is certain Desroches had not yet been able either to remove the useless dressing of his wound nor to look at himself in a mirror. From this day such an idea made him tremble more than ever. Nevertheless, he ventured to withdraw a corner of the protecting taffeta, and found beneath a cicatrix still somewhat red, but which had nothing very repulsive. Following up his inspection, he discovered the different parts of his face were properly knitted together, and that his eye remained clear and healthful. Some bits of the eyebrow were wanting, but that was a small affair. The oblique furrow which descended from the forehead across the cheek to the ear, this was—ah, well! this was a sabre-cut received at the attack on the lines of Bergheim, and nothing is more beautiful—the songs have often enough said so.

Desroches was astonished to find himself again presentable. He placed very adroitly the hair on the wounded side, which had grown gray, beneath the abundant black hair on the left side, extending his moustache as far as possible over the line of the cicatrix, and having put on his new uniform, he went the next day to the esplanade with somewhat of a triumphal air.

In fact, so well had he dressed and adorned himself, his sword hung so gracefully by his side, and he wore his bearskin chapeau so martially inclined in front, that nobody recognised him in the short passage from the hospital to the garden. He arrived first at the bench beneath the trees, and sat down apparently as usual, but in reality much more troubled and more pale, despite the approbation of his mirror.

The two ladies soon after arrived also, but they drew back suddenly on seeing a fine-looking officer occupying their usual place. Desroches was much disturbed.

"What," cried he, "you do not recognise me!"

Do not imagine that these preliminaries conduct us to one of those histories in which pity becomes love, such as it is described in the operas of the present day. The lieutenant had for the future ideas much more serious. Content to be still thought a passable cavalier, he hastened to reassure the two ladies, who appeared disposed, since his transformation, to withdraw the intimacy commenced between the three. Their reserve could not be maintained against his frank declarations.

The union was proper, besides, in all points of view. Desroches had a small inherited property near Epinal. Emilie possessed from her parents a little house at Hagenau, let as the café of the town, and which produced, in the shape of rent, five or six hundred francs, though in truth half of this belonged to her brother Wilhelm, first clerk of the notary of Schennberg.

When the arrangements had been settled they resolved to go for the wedding to this little city, which was the real home of the young girl, who had inhabited Metz for so long a time only for the sake of not leaving her aunt.

Nevertheless they agreed to return to Metz after the marriage. Emilie anticipated great pleasure in again seeing her brother. Desroches was often astonished that this young man was not in the army, like all those of our time; the reply was that he had been exempted on account of his health. Desroches pitied him very much.

Behold then the betrothed couple and the aunt on their way to Hagenau. They took places in the public carriage which relays at Bitche, and which was at that time simply a wagon composed leather and wicker work. The route is beautiful, as you know.

Desroches, who had never traversed it except in uniform, a sabre in his hand, in company with three or four thousand men, admired the solitudes, the strange-looking rocks, the horizons terminated by mountains clothed in dark verdure, and interrupted at times by long valleys. The rich plains of St. Avold; the manufactories of Sarreguemines; the little pieces of compact underwood of Limblingue, where the ash-trees, poplars and firs spread out their triple bed of verdure, shaded with gray and dark green—you know what a charming and magnificent aspect all this has.

Arrived at Bitche, the travellers alighted at the little inn of the Dragon, and Desroches eagerly inquired after me. When I arrived, I saw his new family, and complimented the young lady, who was of a rare beauty and of gentle manners, and who appeared very much in love with her future husband. All three breakfasted with me here, where we are now seated. Many officers, comrades of Desroches, drawn by the rumor of his arrival, came to seek him at the inn, and invite him to dine at the public-house of the fortress, where the staff of the army put up. We agreed the two ladies should withdraw early, and that the lieutenant should give to his comrades all of his last evening of bachelor life.

The repast was gay. Everybody enjoyed his part of the happiness and of the gaiety that Desroches brought back with him. They spoke to him of Italy, of Egypt, with transport, making bitter complaints at the ill-luck which confined so many good soldiers in fortresses on the frontier.

"Yes," murmured some officers, "we suffocate here, the life is so fatiguing and monotonous. We might as well be on shipboard as here, without fights, amusements, or possibility of promotion. The fort is impregnable—said Bonaparte when he passed here on his way to join the army of Germany—we have then nothing left but the chance of dying of ennui."

"Alas!" my friends, replied Desroches, "matters were scarcely more amusing in my time; for like you I have been here, and like you have also complained. I, as a soldier arrived at the dignity of epaulettes by dint of wearing out Government shoes in all the highways of the world; I knew but three things—the exercise, the direction of the wind, and the grammar as people learn it at school. Thus, when I was named sous-lieutenant and sent to Bitche with the second battalion, I regarded my sojourn here as an excellent opportunity for serious study. Occupied with this thought I procured a collection of books, maps and plans. I studied the theory of war, and learned German without study, for in this country, although French, they speak only German. Thus the time, which appears so long for you who have not such things to learn, seemed to me short and insufficient. On the approach of night I took refuge in a little stone room beneath the grand staircase, and closing the loopholes, lit my lamp, and worked. One of these nights of which I speak—"

Here Desroches stopped an instant, passed his hand over his eyes, emptied his glass, and continued, without, however, terminating his last observation.

"You all know," said he, "the little path which ascends from the plain here, and which has been rendered impassable by the removal of a large rock, leaving at present in its place a chasm. Ah well! this passage has always been a fatal one for the enemy every time they have attempted to assail the fort. Scarcely entered on this path, the unfortunates were obliged to support the fire of cannon which razed the ground its entire length."

"You must have distinguished yourself," said a colonel to Desroches; "did you gain your lieutenancy there?"

"Yes, colonel; and there I killed the first, the only man I have ever struck face to face, with my own hand. For this reason the sight of the fort will be always painful to me."

"What is that you say?" cried all. "What! you have been engaged in war twenty years; you have assisted at fifteen pitched battles; at fifty combats possibly, and you pretend to have killed but a single enemy?"

"I have not said that, gentlemen. Of the two thousand cartridges I have rammed into my musket, who knows whether the half have sent a bullet to the goal a soldier seeks. But I declare that at Bitche for the first time my hand has been reddened in the blood of an enemy, and that I did the cruel deed with a sabre which the arm thrusts till it pierces a human breast and is tremblingly buried there?"

"This is true," interrupted one of the officers, "the soldier kills many persons, and never really perceives it. A discharge of musketry is not, to say the truth, an execution of a murderous design but the intention of it. As to the bayonet it does little in the most disastrous charges. This is a conflict in which one of two foes stands firm or yields without coming to blows—the guns clash against each other, and then are raised again when the resistance ceases. The cavalry, for example, strike in reality."

"Yes," rejoined Desroches; "exactly as one never forgets the last regard of an adversary killed in duel, the last rattling in his throat, the sound of his heavy fall, so I bear with me nearly like a remorse—laugh at it, if you can—the image, pale and sad, of the Prussian sergeant whom I killed in the little powder-mill of the fort."

Everybody kept silent, and Desroches commenced his recital:

"It was in the night, and I was at work, as I explained to you just now. At two o'clock everybody should be asleep, except the sentinels. The watch are always silent. However, I thought I heard something like a prolonged movement in the gallery beneath my chamber; some one struck against a door which returned a creaking sound. I ran and listened at the end of the corridor, and in a low voice spoke to the sentinel; no reply. I had soon awakened the cannoneers, put on my uniform, and taking my sabre without its scabbard, I ran in the direction of the noise. We arrived, nearly thirty in number, in the circular space that the gallery forms near its centre, and by the light of some lanterns we recognised the Prussians, whom a traitor had introduced by the closed postern gate. They were pressed together in disorder, and on perceiving us fired some musket shots, of which the discharge was frightful in the feeble light, and beneath the over-arching vaults.

"Then we found ourselves face to face. The assailants continued to come up. Our men descended precipitately in the gallery. We were hardly able to move, but there was between the two parties a space of six or eight feet, a sort of lists that nobody cared to occupy, so stupified were the surprised French, and distrustful the disappointed Prussians.

"The hesitation, however, lasted not long. The scene was illumined by flambeaus and lanterns; some cannoneers had suspended theirs to the walls. A combat like those of ancient days took place. I was in the first rank, and found myself face to face with a Prussian sergeant, of tall stature, covered with chevrons and decorations. He was armed with a gun, but could scarce move it, so compact was the crowd. All these details are still present in my mind, alas! I know not if he thought even to resist me. I rushed towards him; I buried my sabre in his noble heart. The victim opened his eyes in a horrible manner, closed his hands violently, and fell back in the arms of the other soldiers.

"I do not remember what followed. When I recovered my senses I was in the first courtyard, covered with blood. The Prussians, repulsed through the postern gate, had been driven with cannon shots even to their encampment."

After this history there was a long silence, and then other subjects of conversation arose. A sad and curious spectacle for the thoughtful observer; the faces of all these soldiers darkened by the recital of a misfortune so common apparently—and one could discover of what value is the life of a man, even of a German, doctor, by observing the intimidated regards of these destroyers by profession.

"It is certain," replied the doctor, a little bewildered, "that the blood of a man cries very loudly, in whatever manner it be shed. Nevertheless, Desroches did no wrong; he only defended himself."

"Who knows?" murmured Arthur.

"You, doctor, who spoke of capitulations of conscience, tell us if this sergeant's death resemble not, in some degree, an assassination. Is it certain the Prussian would have killed Desroches?"

"Why, what would you have? Such is war."

"Yes, truly, such is war. One kills at a distance of three hundred paces, in the darkness, a man who knows you not, nor sees you. One slaughters face to face and with fury in the looks people towards whom one has no hatred, and with the reflection you have made, one consoles and glorifies himself. And this is done, honorably, among Christian people!"

The adventure of Desroches spread different impressions in the minds of those present. It was now bedtime. Our officer was the first to forget his sorrowful history, for the reason that from the little chamber which had been assigned him he perceived, through the thick foliage of the trees, a certain window of the Hotel du Dragon, illuminated from within by a night-lamp. There slept all his future. When at midnight the challenges of the sentinels awoke him, he said to himself that, in case of an alarm, his courage could no longer, as formerly, galvanise the entire man, and that there would be mingled with it some little regret and fear.

Before the hour of the morning watch, the next day, the captain of the guard let him out. He joined his lady friends, who were walking up and down beside the exterior moat, awaiting him. I accompanied them as far as Neunhoffen, for they designed being married by the civil process at Hagenau, returning afterwards to Metz for the nuptial benediction.

Wilhelm, Emilie's brother, received Desroches in a tolerably cordial manner. The two brothers-in-law regarded each other at times with a fixed attention. Wilhelm was of medium height, but well shaped. His blonde hair was already thin, as if he had been worn by study or by sorrow. He wore blue spectacles on account of his vision, so feeble, he said, that the least light gave him pain. Desroches brought to him a file of papers, which the young clerk examined with curiosity, and then himself produced all the titles of his family, forcing Desroches to read them. But he was dealing with a man confiding in love, and disinterested; the inquiries were not long. This manner of proceeding appeared somewhat to flatter Wilhelm, who took the arm of Desroches, offered him one of his best pipes, and took him to visit all his friends at Hagenau.

Everywhere they smoked and drank strong beer. After ten presentations, Desroches begged to be excused and to be permitted to pass his evenings by the side of his betrothed.

A few days after, the two lovers of the bench and esplanade were two married people, united by the mayor of Hagenau, venerable officer who had been burgomaster before the French Revolution, and who had held in his arms very often the little Emilie, whom possibly he had himself enregistered at her birth. Thus he had whispered to her, the evening before her marriage, "Why do you not marry some good German?"

Emilie appeared to set little value on these distinctions. Even Wilhelm had become reconciled to the moustache of the lieutenant—for it should be said at their first meeting there had been some reserve on the part of these two men. But Desroches, exerting himself very much, and Wilhelm making some effort for his sister's sake, and the good aunt pacifying and softening all their interviews, they succeeded in becoming very good friends. Wilhelm embraced very cordially his brother-in-law after the signing of the contract. The same day—for all was finished by nine o'clock—the travellers set out for Metz. It was six o'clock in the evening when the carriage stopped at Bitche, at the grand hotel of the Dragon.

In a country intersected by streams and patches of woods travelling is not easy. Ten hills for every league caused the travellers to be rudely shaken in their conveyance. This was possibly the reason for the indisposition which the young wife experienced on arriving at the inn. Her aunt and Desroches installed themselves near her, and Wilhelm, who suffered from a consuming hunger, descended to the little hall, where at eight o'clock the supper of the officers would be served.

This time nobody knew of the return of Desroches. The entire day had been employed by the garrison in excursions among the groves of Huspoletden. Desroches, that he might not be obliged to leave his wife, had forbidden the hostess to pronounce his name.

The three, sitting near the little window of the chamber, saw the troops re-entering the fort, and as night approached the fortified slopes were covered with soldiers, eating bread and goat cheese.

Now, Wilhelm, as one who wishes to forget both time and hunger, had lit his pipe and sat down on the sill of the door between the smoke of the tobacco and of the coming repast, double pleasure for the idle and hungry.

The officers, at sight of this citizen-traveller, with his cap pulled down even to his ears, and his blue spectacles, turned towards the kitchen, perceived they would not be alone at table, and wished to make acquaintance with the stranger, for he might come from a distance, be intelligent, recount news, and in such case this would be a piece of good fortune; or, arriving from the environs, keep a stupid silence, and then they would have a silly fellow at whom to laugh.

A sous-lieutenant from the schools approached Wilhelm with a politeness bordering on exaggeration.

"Good evening, sir; do you know any news from Paris?"

"No, sir; do you?" said tranquilly Wilhelm.

"My faith, sir, we never go out of the town of Bitche—how should we know any?"

"And I, sir, never go out from my office."

"Are you perhaps, in the artillery?"

This raillery, directed against Wilhelm's spectacles, enlivened the assembly considerably.

"I am a notary's clerk, sir."

"In truth? at your age this is surprising."

"Sir," said Wilhelm, "if you have any doubts, would you wish to see my passport?"

"No, certainly."

"Ah! assure me you are not ridiculing me, and I will satisfy you on all points."

The assembly became serious.

"I asked you, with no bad intention, if you belonged to the artillery, because you wore spectacles. Do you not know that only the officers of this branch of the service are privileged to wear glasses?"

"And does this prove that I am a soldier, or officer, which you please?"

"Why, everybody is a soldier to-day. You are not twenty-five years old; you should belong to the army, or perhaps you are rich; you have fifteen or twenty thousand francs in rents; your relatives have made some sacrifices on your account—but in such a case, a person hardly dines at the public table at an inn."

"Sir," said Wilhelm, shaking the ashes from his pipe, "possibly you have the right of submitting me to this inquisition, in which case I ought to reply to you plainly. I have not any rents, since I am simply a notary's clerk, as I have told you. I have been discharged on account of my impaired vision. In a word, I am nearsighted."

A general and violent burst of laughter followed this declaration.

"Ah, young man, young man!" cried Captain Vallier, striking him on the shoulder, "you profit by the proverb. It is better to be a coward, and live longer!"

Wilhelm reddened to the eyes.

"I am not a coward, sir, and I will prove it to you, wherever you please. Besides, my papers are in order, and if you are a recruiting officer I can show them to you."

"Enough, enough!" cried some officers; "leave this citizen alone, Vallier. The gentleman is a peaceable individual; he has the right to sup here."

"Yes," said the captain; "thus let us sit down at table, and without rancor, young man. Rest easy, I am not the examining surgeon, and this dining-hall is not a hall of review. To prove to you my good will, I offer to carve for you a wing of this old piece of leather they will give us for a chicken."

"I thank you," said Wilhelm, who had got over his hunger. "I will eat only some of these trout, which are at the end of the table," and he indicated to the servant to bring him the dish.

"Are these really trout?" said the captain to Wilhelm, who had removed his spectacles on sitting down at the table. "My faith, sir, you have better eyesight than myself. Hold, frankly—you would handle your musket quite as well as anybody else; but you have had some protection, you profit by it, very well. You prefer peace—this is a taste, just like any other. For my part, in your place, I could not read a bulletin from the grand army, and reflect that the young people of my age had been killed in Germany without feeling my blood boil in my veins. You are not, then, a Frenchman?"

"No," said Wilhelm, with effort and satisfaction at the same time. "I was born at Hageneau; I am not French; I am a German."

"A German? Hageneau is situated on our side of the frontier; this is a good and beautiful village of the French Empire, department of the Lower Rhine. Look at the map?"

"I am of Hageneau, I tell you—a village of Germany, ten years ago, to-day of France. But, for my part, I am always a German, just as you would remain a Frenchman if your country ever belonged to Germany?"

"You are saying some dangerous things there, my young friend—take care."

"I have done wrong, perhaps," said Wilhelm, impetuously; "it is best to keep such sentiments as mine in one's heart, no doubt, if they cannot be changed. But it is you yourself who have carried matters so far, that it is necessary, at whatever risk, that I justify myself, or pass for a coward. Yes, this is the motive which in my conscience justifies the care I have taken in profiting by an infirmity which probably had not been able to arrest a man of spirit. And besides, there has been enough blood shed in my family; my father poured his, even to the last drop, see you, and for my part—"

"Your father was a soldier?" interrupted Captain Vallier.

"My father was a sergeant in the Prussian army, and defended for some time the territory you are now occupying. He was killed at the last attack on the fort at Bitche."

Everybody was very attentive to these last words of Wilhelm, which stopped the desire they entertained of replying severely to some of his paradoxes touching the peculiar case of his nationality.

"This was in '93?"

"In '93, the 17th of November, my father had set out in the evening from Sirmasen, in order to rejoin his company. I know he told my mother that by means of a bold plan this citadel would be secured without striking a blow. He was brought back to us in a dying condition, twenty-four hours afterwards. He expired on the doorstep, after having obliged me to swear to remain near my mother, who survived him fifteen days. I have learned that, in the attack which took place, he received in his breast a sabre thrust from a young soldier, who thus struck down one of the finest grenadiers in the army of Prince Hohenlohe."

"Why some one has been telling us this story," said the major.

"Yes, indeed!" said Captain Vallier, "this is the very adventure of the Prussian sergeant killed by Desroches."

"Desroches!" cried Wilhelm; "is this of the Lieutenant Desroches that you speak?"

"Oh, no, no," cried an officer in haste, who perceived there would happen some terrible revelation. "This Desroches, of whom we spoke, was a chasseur of the garrison, who died four years ago, for his first exploit did not bring him good fortune."

"Ah! he is dead," said Wilhelm, wiping his forehead, from which fell large drops of sweat.

Some minutes afterwards the officers saluted him, and left him alone. Desroches, having discovered from the window that they had all withdrawn, descended to the dining-hall, where he found his brother-in-law with his elbows on the long table, and supporting his head in his hands.

"What—in fact, we sleep already? But I wish my supper; my wife has finally fallen asleep, and I am terribly hungry. Come, a glass of wine; this will awaken us, and you will keep me company."

"No, I have a headache," said Wilhelm. "I am going up to my chamber. By-the-bye, these gentlemen have said to me a good deal about the curiosities of the fort. Can you not go with me there, to-morrow?"

"Certainly, my friend."

Desroches finished his supper and then went to take possession of the second bed that had been prepared in the chamber whither his brother-in-law had just gone (for Desroches slept alone, being married only by the civil right). Wilhelm could not sleep during the night, sometimes weeping in silence, at others devouring with furious regards the sleeper, who smiled in his dreams.

What is called presentiment resembles very much the fish who precedes and warns the whales, immense and nearly blind, that here projects a sharp rock or that there is a sandy shoal. We move on in life so mechanically that some characters whose nature is careless, would be injured or destroyed without having had time even to think of God, if there appeared not some tarnish on the surface of their happiness. Some people become sad at the flight of a raven, others without motive, and others again are filled with anxiety on awaking, because they have had a mournful dream. All this is presentiment. You are about to run a danger—says the dream; take care—cries the raven; be sad—murmurs the brain, as it becomes heavy with care.

Desroches, towards the end of the night, had a strange dream. He found himself at the bottom of a subterranean vault; behind him walked a white shadow, whose garments rustled at his feet; when he turned round, the shadow recoiled and finally withdrew to such a distance that Desroches distinguished only a white point, which grew larger, became luminous, filled all the grotto, and disappeared. A slight noise made itself audible—Wilhelm re-entered the chamber, his hat on his head, and enveloped in a long blue mantle. Desroches started from his sleep.

"Diable!" cried he, "you have already been out this morning?"

"You must get up," replied Wilhelm.

"But will they open the fort for us?"

"Without doubt. They are all engaged at the exercise. There remains behind only the guard."

"Already! Very well, I am with you—the time only to say good-morning to my wife."

"She is very well; I have seen her; do not occupy yourself about her."

Desroches was surprised at this reply, but he attributed it to impatience, and yielded to a fraternal authority that he intended soon to shake off.

As they passed through the square, on their way to the fort, Desroches cast his eyes on the window of the inn. Emilie sleeps without doubt, said he. Nevertheless, the curtain trembles, is closed, and the lieutenant believed he saw some one withdrawing from the window in order not to be discovered by him.

The wicket was opened without difficulty. An invalid captain, who had not been present at the supper the night before, commanded the post. Desroches took a lantern and prepared himself to lead from hall to hall his silent companion.

After visiting, during some minutes, several points, which seemed scarcely to fix his attention, Wilhelm said:

"Show me, then, the vaults."

"Certainly; but I swear to you, this will be a walk not at all agreeable to me. It is very damp below. Besides, the magazine is beneath the left wing, and there we cannot go without an order from the superior officer. On the right are the water conduits and the unprepared saltpetre; in the middle the counter mines and the galleries—you know what a vault is?"

"No matter. I am curious to visit places where have happened so many sad events—where even you have incurred some dangers, as they tell me."

He will not excuse me, even on such a miserable subject as a cellar.

"Follow me, brother, in this gallery which leads to the iron-bound postern."

The lantern cast on the damp walls a mournful light, which trembled as it was reflected by some sabre blades and musket barrels, partially eaten by rust.

"What are these arms?" asked Wilhelm.

"Those taken from the Prussians, killed at the last attack on the fort, and which my comrades have gathered together as trophies."

"There have been several Prussians died here?"

"Very many, in this circular space."

"Did you not kill here a Prussian sergeant, an old man of tall stature, and having brown moustaches?"

"Without doubt; have I not told you about it?"

"No, not you. But yesterday, at table, they have spoken to me of this exploit—which your modesty had hidden from us."

"What is the matter with you, brother, you grow pale?"

Wilhelm replied in a strong voice:

"Call me not brother—but foe. Look, I am a Prussian! I am the son of this sergeant whom you have assassinated."

"Assassinated!"

"Or killed—what matters! See, here is where your sabre has entered."

Wilhelm had cast aside his mantle and pointed to a rent in the green uniform which he had put on, and which was the identical coat of his father, piously preserved.

"You are the son of this sergeant? Oh! my God, are you not jesting with me?"

"Jesting? Does any one jest with horrors like this? Here my father was killed, his noble blood has reddened these stones—this sabre is, perhaps, his! Take you one of them, also, and give me my revenge for this deed. See, this is not a duel—this is the combat of a German against a Frenchman. En garde!"

"But you are crazy, dear Wilhelm. Put down this rusty sabre. You wish to kill me—am I culpable?"

"Besides, you have the chance now of striking me in my turn, and thus it will be double, at least, on your side. Defend yourself, I say."

"Wilhelm, kill me if you will. I am myself losing my senses—my head turns. Wilhelm, I but acted as every soldier must; think then—besides, I am the husband of your sister; she loves me. Oh! this combat cannot be."

"My sister!—the very reason why we cannot both live beneath the same heaven. My sister! she knows all! She will never consent to see again the one who has rendered her an orphan. Yesterday you said to her your last adieu."

A terrible cry escaped from Desroches, who threw himself on Wilhelm for the purpose of disarming him. The struggle was long, for the young man met the attack of his adversary with the resistance of rage and despair.

"Give me your sabre, wretch!" cried Desroches, "give it to me. You shall not strike me, miserable idiot."

"Right," cried Wilhelm, in a suffocating voice, "kill the son also, in the gallery! The son is a German, do you hear—a German!"

At this moment steps were heard, and Desroches let go his hold. Wilhelm, who had fallen to the ground, made no effort to rise.

"These steps were mine, gentlemen," added the abbé. "Emilie had come to the presbytery to tell me all beneath the safeguard of religion, the poor child. I stifled the pity which spake in the depths of my heart, and when she asked me if she could still love the murderer of her father made no reply. She understood me, pressed my hand, and departed, bathed in tears. A presentiment took possession of me. I followed her, and when I learned they had told her at the hotel that her brother and husband had gone to visit the fort, I suspected the frightful truth. Fortunately I arrived in time to prevent a new catastrophe between these two men, crazed with rage and grief."

Wilhelm, although disarmed, turned a deaf ear to the prayers of Desroches; he was overwhelmed with sorrow, but his eye still retained all its fury.

"Inflexible man!" said I to him, "will you awake the dead, and will you bring before us such frightful fatalities as this! Are you not a Christian, and will you usurp the justice of God? Will you become here the only criminal, the sole murderer? The expiation will be made, doubt not—but it belongs not to you to anticipate nor to force it."

Desroches pressed my hand, and said:

"Emilie knows all. I will never see her again. I know what I have to do in order to give back to her her liberty."

"What say you," cried I, "a suicide?"

At these words Wilhelm arose and seized the hand of Desroches.

"No," said he, "I was wrong. It is I alone who am culpable, and who ought to have kept my secret and my despair!"

I will not paint to you the anguish we suffered in this fatal hour. I employed all the reasonings of religion and philosophy without discovering a satisfactory issue from this cruel situation. A separation was indispensable in any case, but what means to make the motives appear just. There would be not only a painful investigation to undergo, but still a political danger in revealing these fatal circumstances.

I undertook above all to counteract the dark projects of Desroches, and to impress on his heart the religious sentiments which make suicide a crime. You know that this unfortunate young man had been nurtured in the school of the materialists of the eighteenth century. Yet since his wound his ideas had changed very much, and doubts had obtruded themselves on his mind as to whether these philosophers were correct in their views. In virtue of this vague religious state, he accepted my consolations.

Some days passed by. Wilhelm and his sister had not quitted the inn; for Emilie had been very unwell after so many rude shocks. Desroches lodged at the presbytery, and read during entire days some pious books I lent him. One day he went alone to the fort and remained there several hours, and on his return he showed me a sheet of paper on which his name was inscribed. It was a captain's commission in a regiment which was about to leave in order to rejoin the Partoneaux division.

We received, at the end of a month, the news of his death, as glorious as singular. Whatever may be said of the species of frenzy which cast him in the conflict, his example was a great encouragement for all the battalion, which lost very many troops in the first charge.

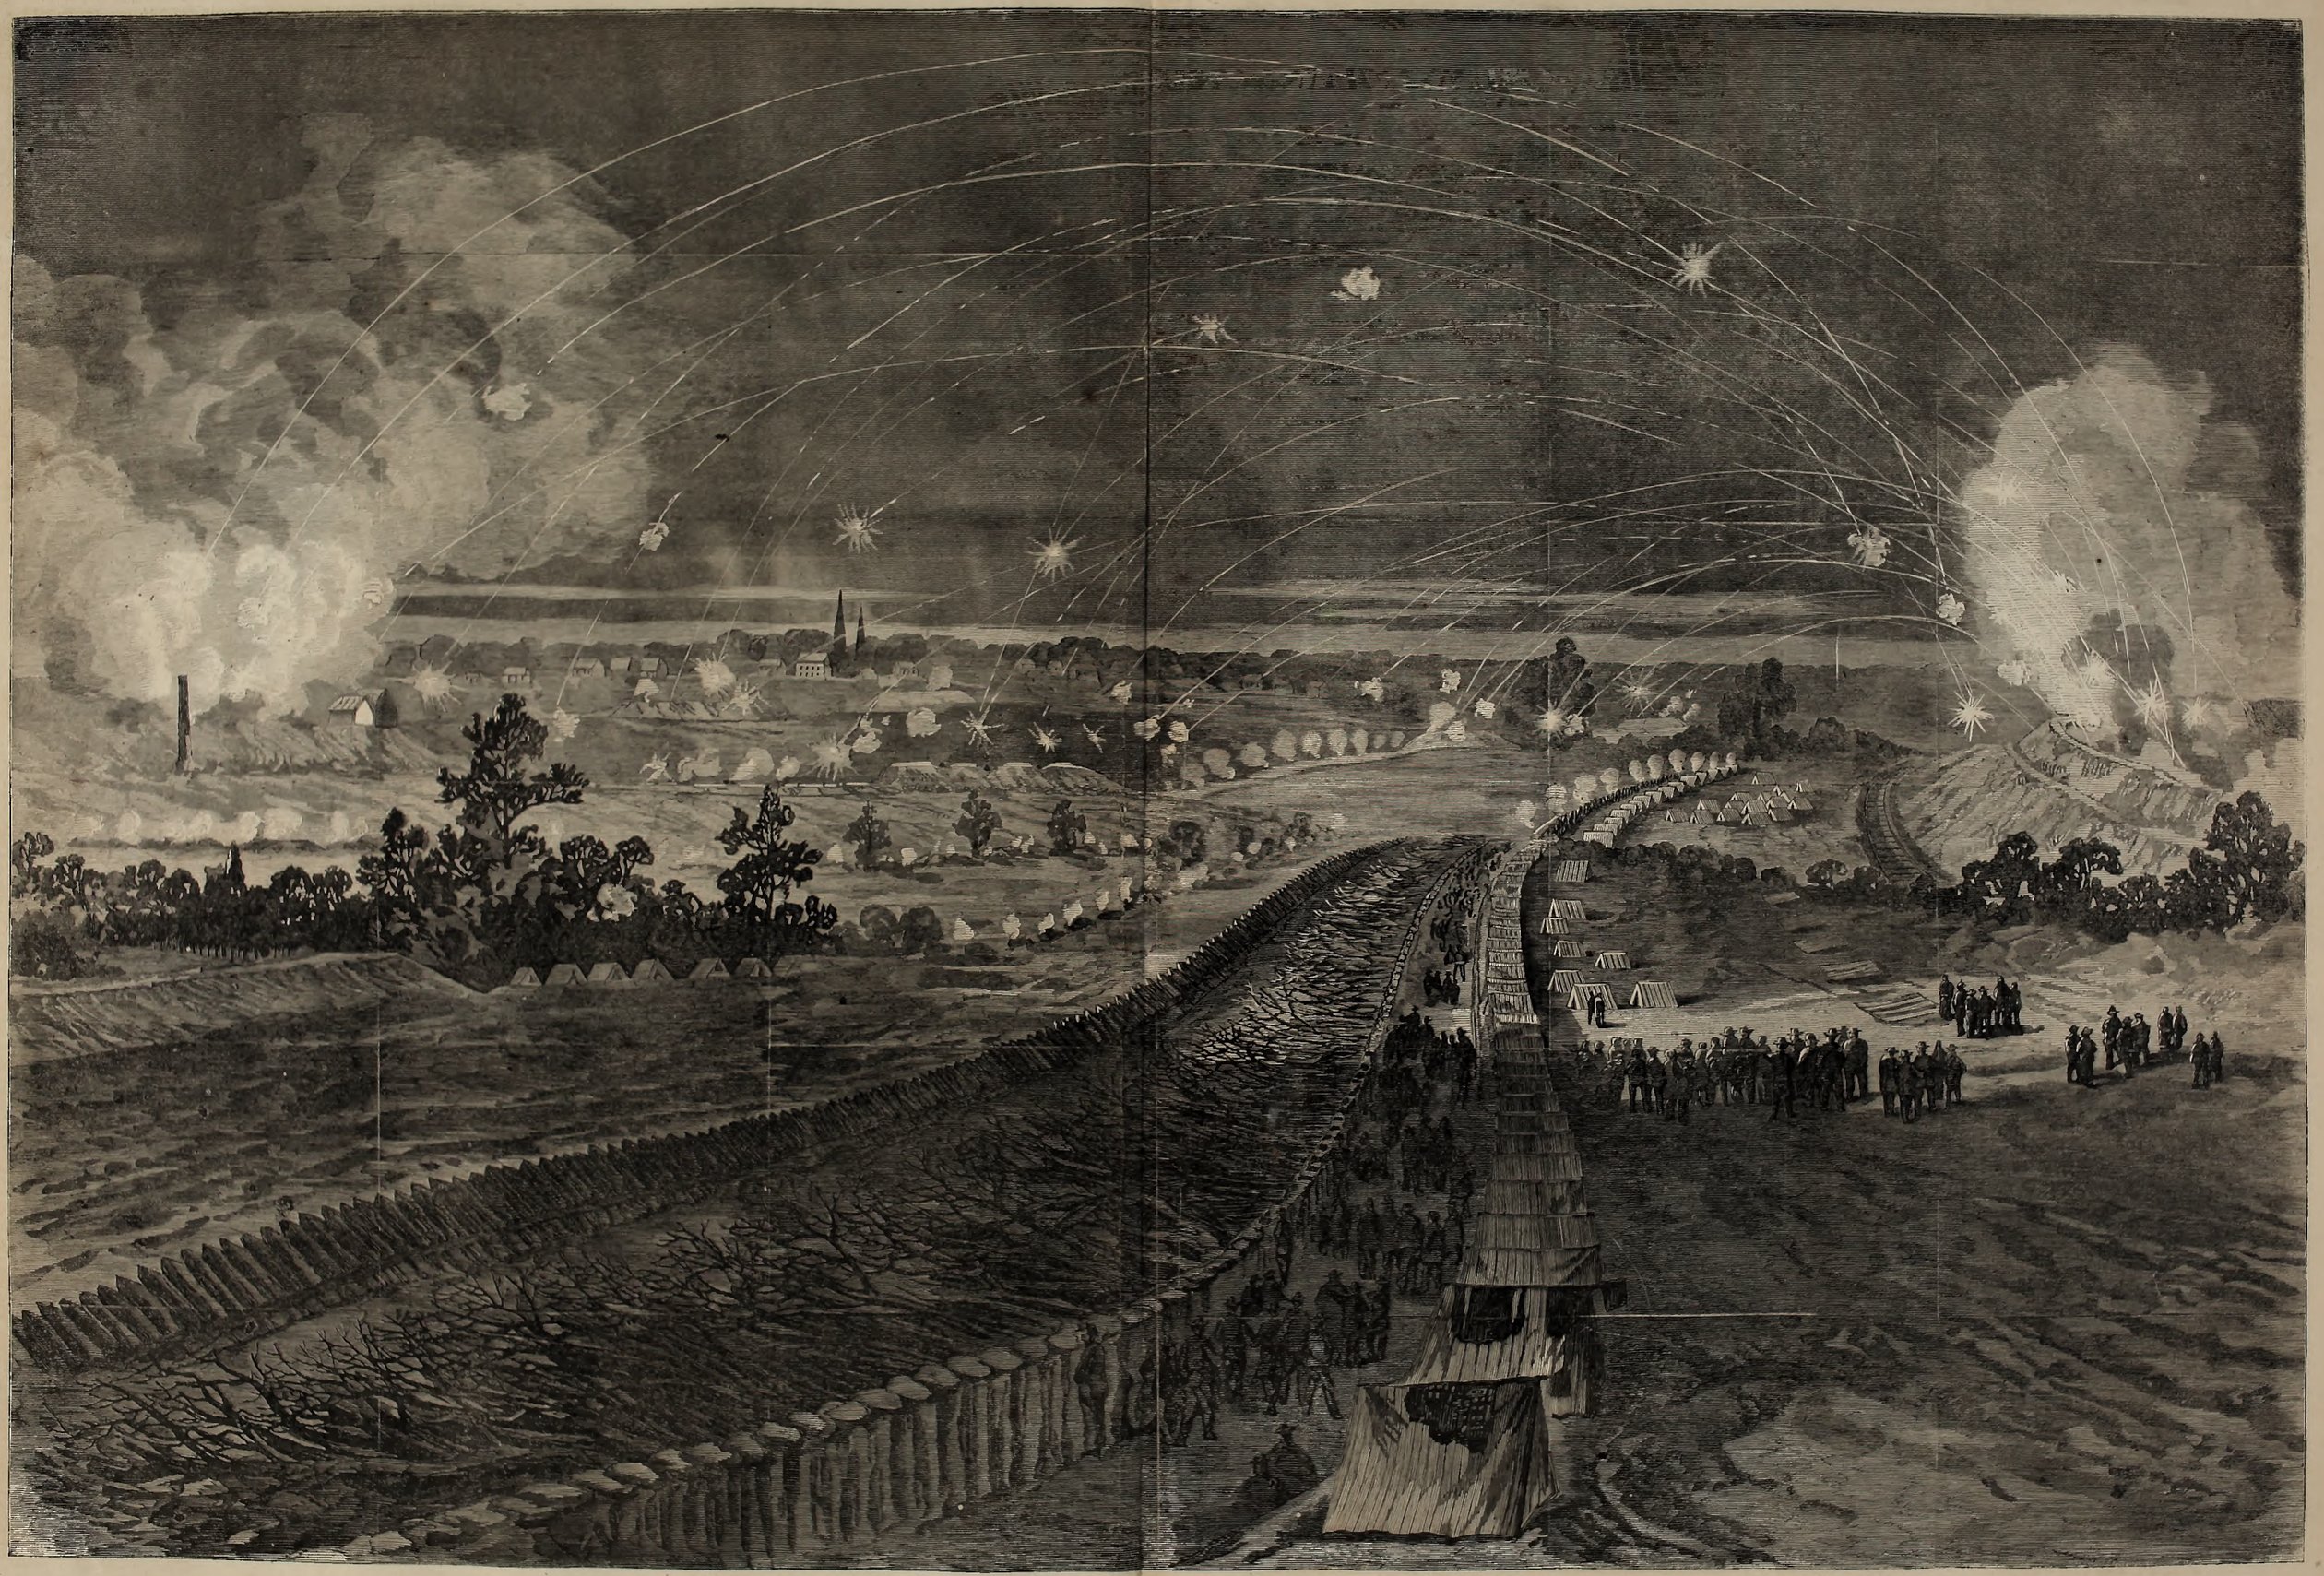
Everybody remained silent after this recital. Each one kept to himself the strange thoughts which such a life and such a death excited. The abbé added, as he rose:

"If you wish, gentlemen, that we change, this evening, the usual direction of our customary walk, we will follow this valley of poplars colored by the setting sun, and I will lead you to Butte-aux-Lierres, whence we can see the cross of the convent into which Madame Desroches has retired."

GOLDSBORO AND THE ARMY OF THE SOUTH.

Goldsboro is like every other community of North Carolina—a cluster of wooden and white-washed habitations, some boasting parlors, none at present vain of its refections; it is smaller than Newberne, larger than Kinston, but what with thousands of riders and teams, and the sweeping Carolina pine-breeze, it is far dustier than both. At every turn the Bedouin wind, a far more rapid campaigner than Sherman, throws dust in the eyes of his opponents.

The pine woods are lurid with the blaze and smoke of camps for miles and miles around. There are none other than pine woods in North Carolina, saving a few rank cypresses which stand on guard at the ditches and swamps. The whole State seems one lonely stretch of pine barrens and swamps, and the March winds roar over a full diapason of the pines. Passing Kinston to Goldsboro, the country is evidently more habitable. Farm domains, each with long patches of blackened stump-fields, are made prim with peach orchards, whose blossoms pink the country round. Pine forests are smoking; fences, running zig-zag, are on fire; trees, burning at the trunk, crackle and fall; underbrush is seared away—thus runs the brand mark of the army all the way to Goldsboro.



Shaggy outriders are beyond the woods, foraging far and wide for the camps, swooping upon chicken and pig, and, possibly, once in a while pausing at farm-houses to look for a silver spoon. A train of "bummers"—by which name the mounted infantry of the army is contemptuously and inelegantly styled—passes by in procession, bearing cornucopias of forage. The regular forager, however, is not the "bummer." The latter is a kind of scout, with a roving commission to discover subsistence and to bring in news—to live, in short, a perfect freebooter as long as he can be made available for keeping the army in supplies. Approaching Columbia, these shabby cavaliers preceded the army like a swarm of locusts, spreading out on every side and bringing and driving into the military toils all things feasible. They searched houses from basement to garret, and, too seldom, perhaps, spared silver-plate and jewellery. Earth could not hide secreted treasures from the shrewd prod of their bayonets, and no landlord or housewife was too cunning for their cross-examination and search-warrants. In a word, they "ransacked the ages and spoiled the climes," in the miniature scale of the Carolinas.

The deeds of some of these men are unquestionably a blot upon the fair fame of the army; but such conduct was, perhaps, inseparable from the situation, as it is from war itself. South Carolina alone, and especially the neighborhood of Columbia, was fated to endure the rigor of their peculiar scourge. Beauregard found them greatly too many for him. Telegraphed to hold Columbia, he dispatched back to his superior that he had not sufficient force to keep out even the enemy's foragers. Columbia was burnt, but not by the raiders or foragers. The inspiration of that disaster will perhaps be traced to the terrible and inhuman afflictions suffered by some of our soldiers in South Carolina. It was not, however, deliberately incited, but was the work of intoxication, for which pandering Carolinians are to blame.

The aforesaid outriders of the army sometimes met in the swamps and woods of the Columbia region South Carolina ladies who had fled thither in unnecessary terror for refuge. There they were—wild, cold, and wretched—fearful of their created Frankenstein, the imagined devouring Yankee. Some of those ladies may have looked from Charleston towers, and cheered the attack upon the little garrison of Sumter. They were women, and kindness was a patent right of their condition, to which all women may lay claim. But it is nevertheless impossible not to observe how the slow retribution has visited the palace of that Herod's daughter who demanded the head of John the Baptist to be brought to her upon a charger.

An Irishman swearing the peace against his three sons, thus concluded his affidavit:

"And this deponent saith, that the only one of his children who showed him any real filial affection was his youngest son Larry, for he never struck him when he was down!"

THE LAST NIGHT ATTACK IN FRONT OF PETERSBURG, BY THE UNION FORCES UNDER GEN. GRANT, MARCH 31.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

THE ANGEL AND THE CHILD.

I saw an angel in my sleep,
Pass out o'er the celestial town;
By golden stair and starry keep,
The angel of the Lord came down.

He strolled into purple flame
His pathway through the elysian sky,
The angel of the Lord that came
To where a little child did lie.

I saw their faces, near and clear,
His was the child's, the child's was his;
O babe, the angel gave no fear,
Now you shall taste an angel's kiss!

I looked again, and in my dream,
I saw the angel and the child
Pass hand in hand, athwart the gleam
Of immortal Paradise unbridled.

On to the Throne. They shall behold
The Father, God face to face alway.
Mother, the little limbs are cold;
Your angel baby died to-day!

TOUCHED!

BY C. SHACKELFORD.

(Concluded from our last.

It was late at night when the old-fashioned coach, a load of the vehicles of "long ago," stopped in the middle of the door of the neat little hotel. I found that an accession of visitors had deprived me of my old room, so that I was compelled to occupy an apartment connected with another by a door that was locked and bolted and the key gone. A man who has once been robbed is usually averse of men and things that are strange to him. I had been robbed, and was wary of everything that would permit me to become a victim for the second time.

So I quietly pushed the handle of my toothbrush into the keyhole, carefully examined the light bolt, put my valise and pocket-book under my pillow, and went to bed and to sleep. About two hours later I was awakened by a noise that I believed to be of enough importance to make me bound by some one in the next room tampering with the lock of the intervening door. I was soon convinced of my mistake by the peculiar loudness of the noise. No burglar would have been insane enough to create such a disturbance. I listened and exclaimed several minutes before I was able to divine the cause of these outrageous sounds; then everything was apparent to me. The sound was that of a laughing drunk in my foolishness, and then shutting eye and tried to go to sleep. But that abominable noise did not cease in a hurry. It was not as monotonously loud as ever. Then I began to taste this unconscious sorrow because he had dispelled and utterly destroyed my dream dream, in which I was talking with my love in a lily pond, picking lily-buds, that burst open as we touched them and let forth fairy angels made out of sunshine. And I dreamed that one of these sprites had fallen into the water and was drowning, and that Nettie and I were trying to rescue him with a sheet of gold tissue-paper, when everything, lily-pond, Nettie and sprites, suddenly disappeared at the utterance of this sneeze, and I awoke with a discriminating sense of the effect of sound.

After enduring the noise for nearly ten minutes, my patience vanished, and I became, after a fashion, desperate, regardless of everything except a removal of the cause. I seized one of my heavy shoes, and violently hurled it against the door that separated me from the deep sleeper. There was a sound, half scream, half-groan, then —silence. Delighted with the success of my attack, I went to sleep very easily, perfectly certain whether the sneeze was a large man or a small one—an invalid or a ruffian.

Next morning, while dressing, I could not help laughing at the mark made by my shoe on the door; then I wondered if the sleeper, whom I had roughly quieted, had descended to breakfast. I listened intently, but I heard no sound in the next room. Then I tried the keyhole with my eye, but it was covered on the other side. I was ashamed now of my display of temper, and earnestly wished that I had not been so hasty and violent in my demonstration of annoyance. Dark as it was entering the cause. We contemplate matters very differently in daylight from what we think of them in the night. I, therefore, crushed this feeling, angrily to myself: "George, you have made a fool of yourself, and you cannot help it, so be brave!" and with this resolution to myself I went down into the room a little more carefully than usual, nevertheless.

As I was turning the key in the lock, the door of the next room opened, and its occupant quietly came forth into the passage.

It was my friend, Miss Nettie!

I cannot express the feelings that possessed me when I saw this lady. I was angry with myself and ashamed of my conduct, that made me appear her unpardonable and outrageous. I knew that I must do or say something.

"Miss Merrill," I said, going towards her, and greatly embarrassed, "permit me to try and explain the—"

Before I could utter another wordshe had passed me and was descending the stairs. She never looked at me, but directly ahead, and I should not have believed that she saw me if she had not, in passing, so gathered in her dress as to prevent any possible contact with mine. For a moment I was angry; but my love triumphed over such a base feeling, and I went down to breakfast, confident that, if I could but explain the affair, she would not cherish any harsh thoughts against me.

Miss Merrill, her mother, and a pompous, truculent old gentleman, who was reading a newspaper through gold-rimmed eyeglasses, and rapped loudly with his knuckles every little while for a waiter, all sat at the further end of the table. They numbered just me, laughing and talking together, just as I had finished my meal.

I followed them out upon the piazza, which was the coolest place there as could pass the morning, and where the view of the bay and sea was magnificent. The gentleman gave a few feet above the ground, and faced the principal street. It was the hour when the stage thus runs between Bodlinn and the aforesaid station, four miles distant, should have made its appearance, and I left the dining-room with the intention of waiting its arrival, though the real reason may have been a purpose to speak to the woman whom I loved. She and her mother were seated at the other end of the piazza; and, so far as I could discover, they did not even think me worthy of a glance. I felt assured, too, that the daughter had, by this time, told her mother of my conduct. They must have known of my presence, for I was, at that moment, the only person beside themselves, on the piazza. "So much for using a woman like this and calling in love with her!" I said to myself, sullenly and bitterly. But I was immediately ashamed of such a sentiment, and resolved to address them, apologize for my behavior, and ascertain if we could not again be friends, for even as strangers we had been familiar.

I had taken a few steps forward when I heard my name called, and, looking in the direction of the elegant gentleman with the hard knuckles,

"Now for a tornado of passion," I thought. "He must be the father, knows everything and feels as one has an object upon which to vent his wrath for my disturbance of his daughter's slumbers."

So I folded my arms in a determined manner so as to produce, possibly, an appearance of courageous indifference to all the thunder would say. I drove my cane dust on his coattcore, and he devoted several seconds to brushing it off. He came inquiring, and said:

"Well?"

He took out his handkerchief and tried to polish a grease spot where the dust never would vanish.

"Are you Mr. George Lacie?" he demanded, rubbing his spectacles with his flowered yellow silk handkerchief as industriously as he had the grease spot, and looking at me all the time as if I were a criminal and he my judge.

"I am Mr. George Lacie," I said, wondering of what nature would be his first outburst of his ire.

"Mr. George Lacie, of the Seventh Dallas street?"

"The same."

"Then I am your uncle!" he exclaimed, triumphantly.

"I don't know you, sir—haven't my uncles that you mention dead, and, quickly, thinking the man was trying to impose upon me,

I turned to leave him, but he laid his hand upon my shoulder, and

"Stop, sir!" he commanded, fixing his glasses upon his nose and hesitly regarding me through them, "I am not to be put off in this manner. I am not surprising that you do not know me, for we never saw each other before this morning—not at least consciously. But I am your uncle, nevertheless if I hadn't just rea! your name in the register and asked the clerk to point you out to me."

As he said this he drew himself up, a dim suspicion of his identity stole upon me. I had seen all of my relations, so far as I knew, except one, who had sent me, years before, a letter, which I read immediately after my father's death. My uncle, who had never seen me nor I him. I am afraid I have not before mentioned the latter circumstances looks, and he recognised something, some change in my face or manner, that gave him annoyance.

"I see, sir, you are he demanded, as if I were his son or his servant.

"What sir, me? I—I—I think, you are my uncle, sir."

"Most certainly."

"I remember that an uncle of mine once wrote to me a letter—such a letter, it was, as might be expected from his majesty the King of the Canadas. He signed his name Merrill, and he was an uncle that I had never seen, and—"

"Never want to see!" he interrupted, with a look that I knew he would have given me had he said the words with a mock mournfulness that made me smile. "But, by Jove! I have forgotten. We had best shake hands, I suppose," and he held the end of the porch. Forget what I wrote, he friends and come along with me and be introduced. The rest of the affair, as it may be called, came from there last night, and am going back to-morrow. Come along."

I did not speak these last words the stage, followed closely by a light open buggy, in which were two men, came rapidly down the street.

"Wait a minute, please," I called, wishing to have a little time for preparation to meet the woman whom I loved, and to whose free pardon the way now seemed clear and hopeful.

I stepped myself on the railing around the porch and waited the coming of the crowded stage. A glance showed me that the ladies were leaning forward and gazing. My uncle stood at my side, hands clasped in hand, and with an appearance of curiosity visible in his motions and face.

The men had left the buggy, and, standing in the walk, were watching, very keenly, as I thought, the passengers that came out of the coach. I could not tell why I became so exceedingly interested in the actions of these two dark-complexioned men. It may have been because my curiosity was excited by their refusal to have their horse taken to the stable; or perhaps it was because of their watchful actions; their waiting as the coach, their very presence, that showed that more pleasure had not brought them to this little out-of-the-way village. I watched them and the other travellers. The first one that emerged from the coach was a pale and feeble boy of sixteen, followed by his mother; then an old lady, with the inevitable handbox that old ladies carry; then a gentleman and lady and little girl; last of all there appeared a spruce, dandyish fellow of about twenty-eight years of age.

As he stepped for a second on the step of the stage, his eyes glanced towards the porch, and he nodded his head to the ladies, who suddenly arose and came towards where I was sitting. I heard Miss Nettie ask:

"What can have brought my husband down here so suddenly, papa?"

And the old gentleman growled out:

"How can I know his whims? He's probably on his pleasure tour."

I heard these words from man and woman, and felt a terrible pain in my heart.

Without a word or warning word and through my own blindness, I knew that I had loved and did love the wife of another. I did not dare to turn my face and look, though I knew that she was beside her uncle. But while these words had been spoken, and just as the young man had reached the ground, I saw the two men first look into each other's faces and then step forward right into his path.

They spoke to him in a low voice, and I saw that his face grew white. A hand was laid upon his arm; but he gave another glance towards the porch, then, with the quickness of thought, raised his light bamboo cane, with its heavy knob of lead, and struck the larger of the men to the earth. Then he sprang back into the buggy—and was gathered in his hands.

But the little, lithe man was just as sudden in his movements. He seized the horse's bits with one hand, while the other held a revolver that was ominously pointed at the head of the fugitive leader.

"Get out of that and come here!" ordered the man, as he cocked the pistol. And as the other obeyed, and stood by the sidewalk, he found that the wounded man was waiting for him with a glittering wristlet of steel, with which he pinioned the right hand he dealt him such a powerful stroke.

All this action was of a minute's duration; it was quick, active, masterly work. I heard a faint moan—the cry of a wounded heart—and turned to find that my uncle's daughter had fainted and fallen into my arms. The scene was very evident. They—father and mother—gently carried her into the house, and left me alone with my thoughts. I had not time to be alone, so I went down to where the men and their prisoner were standing, surrounded by a group of curious people.

"What does all this mean?" I asked of the man who had been struck with the cane.

The question was repeated, patting an unsightly cut on the face with his handkerchief. "Mean? This 'ere villain mean? Why, he's a thief, sir. It looks ugly, don't it?" removing the handkerchief.

"It certainly is a bad cut; and you ought to have it dressed immediately. But why did you get it?"

"Because he carried a loaded cane and used it. That's evident!"

"You do not understand me. Why have you arrested him?"

"Oh, beg pardon, sir! Well, he's arrested for a robbery. We've been waiting for him two days for the reason that we've been informed by the stage-stated before we knew exactly whether he was in it—and he wasn't in it when it first started. Then we've been waiting for a chance to put the chap to be took. I didn't think it of him," and he gave a sort of admiring look at the prisoner that elicited his cheek as if in applause of his liveliness.

"Would you tell me his name and whom he robbed?" I inquired, faintly. I was curious to know the crime of the husband of the woman I loved.

The detective took a slip of paper out of his pocket, saying:

"I think I have his name. I always go by description, though. Yes, here it is. Yes! here it is. Sheldon—Fred. Sheldon. Robbed Geo. Lacie, merchant, of $5,000. Will staying at Bodlinn. Description—Good looking, couldn't find him in the city; but we thought that, sooner or later, he'd steal down to his wife. You see! He's trapped, you see, John"—turning to his companion—"let's leave!"

"Wait a minute!" I said. "What have you done with the money, Sheldon?" I asked, going up to him. "I would like to know; for I am Mr. Lacie."

"Did it!" was his surly answer.

"Take your time!" I suggested. "The money will do you no good when you are in the penitentiary."

He did not reply.

I went into the hotel to make arrangements for an immediate departure. My uncle came to me.

"I have seen Fred," he said, "and found out what I didn't know before—that he had married. He is a rascal but he is the husband of my stepdaughter, whom I dearly love. Let me give you back the money, and you give him his liberty."

"That would be unjust to myself and to my partner, I do not—"

The door opened, and Sheldon's wife—a woman very dear to my heart, though she was the wife of another—ran into the room and knelt beside my chair.

"Mercy!" she begged, taking my hand in hers, "mercy for my husband—for myself!"

I felt hot tears fall upon my hands.

"Do not make two lives wretched," she pleaded.

"Yes, it shall be mercy. Your husband shall be released.

I felt her lips touch my hands.

Her, sorrowing woman, she did not know, never knew, how madly I loved her, and how gladly I would have done a hundred times as much to make her happier. I freed myself from her grasp and rushed from the room.

I had Sheldon released. With my sorrowful heart and self-respect—impressed in my heart, yet struggling for liberty, I returned that morning to the city—to live alone a cheerless, hopeless life.

CLOUDLAND.

I'm a home in cloudland,
The rivers run o'er golden sand;
And all that strength the dark pines stand
Round my home in cloudland.
The roses are blowing,
The fountains are flowing,
'Tis always midsummer in cloudland.
No dews o'er weeping,
No shadows e'er creeping,
Near my home in cloudland.

I've a guest in cloudland,
One rare knight at my command,
Who'd gird at Death for my white hand,
And dwell with me in cloudland.
Soft music is playing,
And we two go straying,
Deep in the cloud beds of cloudland.
Where elf chimes are ringing,
Strange melody dinging
Around my home in cloudland.

CHAPTER XIX.—MR. HILLARY SPEAKS HIS MIND.

AFTER that meeting in Hyde Park, Francis Tredethlyn came very often down to the Cedars, so often as to engender a vague uneasiness in Miss Hillary's mind. She knew that he loved her. If that sudden flashing out of the study had not occurred to reveal the fact, Maude must have been something less than a woman had she been blind to so much devotion that was tendered by every look and tone of her adorer. She knew that he loved her, and that he had done battle with his own heart and with a blind and ignorant fate, before he could bring himself to the point of unconditional submission to the dictates of his unacknowledged love. She did not know that Julia Desmond had taken good care to inform Francis of that engagement, and that the young man's pride had driven him to his delicious torture. She did not know this, and all that womanly compassion which was in her nature, that gift which makes every child she moved itself in the impulsious relief of bare-faced tramps and vagabonds about the Twickenham lanes, had its pampering of that unknown pet dogs and canary birds, all her womanly pity, I say, was aroused by the thought that she was loved, and loved by a man so honest and handsome.

Thus it came to pass that she could no longer endure the sense which events were taking, and which she forced upon speaking to her father. They had dined alone one bright June evening—they were not often thus together now, for Mr. Hillary had taken to the habit of inviting visitors from London, and the ponderous mutton and croquet-playing young ladies inflicted a good deal of their company upon Maude. They had dined alone, and Miss Hillary seized the opportunity of speaking to her father upon that one subject which was being occupied her thoughts.

"Mr. Tredethlyn comes here very often, papa," she said, breaking ground very gently.

Mr. Hillary sighed as he gave a little wring as it were behind the claret jug, from which comfortable shelter he replied to his daughter's remark:

"Often, my dear! I suppose he does spend a good deal of his time here. I am glad that he should do so, as he is an excellent young man, a noble-hearted young fellow, the best friend I have in the world."

Mr. Hillary was a long time filling that one glass of claret, and his face was quite hidden by the crystal jug.

"Yes, papa, he is very good; but do you think it is quite right—you may wish to invite him so often?"

"Right—wise?" cried Mr. Hillary; "what, in the name of all that's absurd, can you mean by talking of the right or wisdom of an invitation to dinner? The young man likes to come here, and I like the young man, and like to see him here. That is about all that can be said upon the subject."

Maude was silent for some moments. It was very difficult to discuss this question with her father, but she had grown familiar with difficulties within the past few months, and was no longer the frivolous girl who had known no letter cause of anxiety than the uncertain health of her Skye terriers. She returned to the charge presently.

"Don't pape, I am sorr— sorry you about this business," she said, gen— but there are such peculiar circumstances in our acquaintance with Mr. Trevlethyn; we are under so deep an obligation to him, and—"

"And on that account we ought to shut our eyes in his face, I suppose!" exclaimed Mr. Hillary, with some show of impetience. "My dear Maude, what mare's nest have you lighted upon?"

"It is so difficult for me to explain myself, papa, you can never imagine how difficult. But I think you ought to understand what I mean. When Julia was here, Mr. Trevlethyn's name was quite natural, and I was always glad to see him; but it is very awkward now to him for the loan of that money which resulted in the breaking of Julia's engagement. I cannot forget that night, papa; nothing but desperation would have prompted me to appeal to Francis Trevlethyn, and now that we are under this great obligation to him, I feel that we are bound to him by a kind of duty. We have, at least, no right to deceive him."

"Deceive him! Who does deceive him?"

"Willingly, no one. But he may deceive himself, papa. Even Julia does not so speak ill of Francis. Upon the night on which I appealed to him for that loan he told me that he loved me, even almost as we had supposed Julia loved him; he was something in his manner that convinced me of his sincerity, though I was shocked at the want of honor he showed in such a declaration. But now that this engagement to Julia has been broken off, indirectly through my agency, he may think it likely that—"

"He may think it likely that you would be wise enough to accept one of the last fellows that ever loved for your husband. Is that what you mean, Maude?"

"Papa!"

"Oh, my dear, I have no doubt you think me a cruel father, because I venture to make such a suggestion. But surely, Maude, you cannot have been blind to the many more than friendly devotion every first is been obvious to any one gifted with the smallest power of perception. John Desmond was ruined by her consummate coolness to inveigle the poor fellow into a false position; but in spite even of that foolish engagement, he has been a friend to us, Maude, from the time I have seen it, and have counted, heaven knows how fully, upon a marriage between you and him."

"You have done this, papa, and yet you know all about Harcourt," exclaimed Maude, reproachfully.

"I have that you were a foolishly sentimental girl, ready to believe in any yellow-skinned young Corsair like Crichton, who could write pretty speeches, and criticise the newest Italian opera, or a dramatic poem. But I know something more than this, Maude; I know the state of my own affairs, and that my only hope for you lay in a wealthy marriage."

"And you thought that I would marry for money—you could think so meanly of me, papa!"

"I thought that you were sensible, high-spirited girl; and that when you came to know the desperation of the case, you would show yourself of the true metal—as you did that night at Brighton; as you did when you asked Trevlethyn for the loan that saved me from ruin."

Lionel Hillary paused, and his daughter, as he spoke, and grasped that of his daughter. In the next minute she was by his side, bending over him and caressing him, and likely it was the nearest to dawn dimly upon Maude Hillary that perhaps this father, whom she loved so dearly, was not the noblest and most beautiful of men; but that such knowledge had come to her, it had only intensified the tenderness with which, from her earliest childhood, she had regarded that fond, indulgent father. The experience of sorrow had transformed and exalted her nature; and she was able to look upon Lionel Hillary's weakness as implying regret, rather than with feelings of contempt or indignation.

"Dear papa," she said, very gravely, "you and I love each other so dearly, that there should be no possibility of any misunderstanding between us. I can never marry Mr. Trevlethyn, feeling that he is good and generous-minded and simple-hearted; I feel the extent of our obligation to him, and would pay it with my life, if by this means that I am fearful lest my false impression may arise in his mind. Pray, dear papa, that she will not misunderstand me, and do not become here so often—at any rate, not until you have been able to repay him his money, not until the burden of your obligation has been removed from me."

Lionel Hillary laughed aloud.

"Not until the money has been paid! I'm afraid, in that case, Trevlethyn will stop away from this house for many months to come."

"A long time, papa! But you told me that you would be able to repay the twenty thousand pounds," said the girl, with a beaming eye.

"And I dare say I shall be able to pay the money some day. Such a loan as that is not repaid in a few months, Maude. How should you understand these matters? The twenty thousand pounds went to fill a yawning gulf in my business, and I must be hard as sayer to me to get the same amount of money back out of that gulf as it would for a single diver to bring up the treasures of a wreck from the sea."

Maude sighed wearily. It seemed as if a kind of net had been woven round her, and that she suddenly found herself in the centre of it, unable to move.

"Papa," she cried, "you don't mean that Mr. Trevlethyn's money is lost?"

"Lost! No, child; but it may be a very long time before I shall be able to pay him. If you were not so foolish as to throw away one of the noblest hearts in Christendom—to say nothing of the fortune that goes along with it—there would be very little need for me to worry myself about this money."

"Oh, I understand, papa. If I were Mr. Trevlethyn's wife, you would not be obliged to pay the twenty thousand pounds," said Maude, very slowly.

"I should not be tormented about it as I am now. Say no more, my dear; you don't understand these matters, and you distress me nearly mad with your questions about my affairs."

"Forgive me, papa. No, I don't understand—I can't understand all at once; it came so strange to me."

She bent her head and kissed her father on the forehead, and then left the room very slowly, leaving him alone in the still summer twilight, with a belated wasp buzzing feebly amongst the dust and flowers of the table. Maude went to her own room, and sitting there in the dusk, shed some of the bitterest tears that had ever fallen from her young eyes. The discovery of her father's love with regard to her had humiliated her to the very dust. The idea that Francis Trevlethyn's loan would never be repaid was torture to her for the sense of honor—torture which was rendered still more poignant by the recollection of her own part in the transaction. Would he ever be paid? Would that money, for the loan of which—and never more than the loan—she had supplicated her friend's son, ever be returned? She turned over he returned to the generous young man who had so nearly lent it? Her father had said that he was not in the least in love with her, and from his manner that had motivated the effect of his words. To Maude Hillary's mind the idea of a very severe punishment to the latter kind, and for which she herself was responsible. Twenty thousand pounds! All those figures in the ledger appeared to swim in a great sea of confusion as she thought of that terrible sum—twenty thousand pounds, which she was to see again and again, and which were no longer an heiress to whom money was dross. She was a penniless, helpless girl, and one of the most penniless girls, by reason of her inexperience of poverty.

She thought of Harcourt Lowther, and his image appeared to dance before her eyes, clothed in such a bright and pleasant thing to look at, but with no promise of help, no inspiration of hope, no pledge of coming to her assistance.

"Perhaps papa is right after all," she thought, "and Harcourt would scarcely care to burden himself with a penniless wife."

She was ashamed of this brief treason against her lover almost as soon as the thought had elapsed into her mind. She was ashamed of her as if there could be no security of any happiness upon this earth.

"I will tell Francis Trevlethyn the truth about myself," she thought: "he shall not be deceived as to anything in which I am concerned. He shall know of my poverty and my helplessness."

Maude did not go down stairs again on that night, nor did Mr. Hillary send for her, as it was his wont to do sometimes when he was lonely. He may be that he scarcely cared to encounter his daughter after that conversation in the dining-room, which had left upon her young mind such a dread of the father of Mr. Capulet's class, who could order his daughter to marry the County Paris at a few days' notice, or, in the event of her refusal, bid her run in the streets of Verona. But from the very first he had been bent upon bringing about a union between Francis and Maude, and he could not possibly over the girl's resolute rejection of any such alliance.

"And what would become of her if I were to die to-morrow?" he thought; "and what is to become of my business if I fail to secure a rich partner?"

ATTACK ON PETERSBURG.

On sketch represents the heavy bombardment of Petersburg in the last night attack. The military history of the world presents nothing more momentous than the siege of Petersburg, which began on the 15th days of April. While to the Lieut.-General is due the credit of conducting the campaign, yet that gallant soldier, Gen. Z. Sheridan, will ever belong the ever-memorable Army of Shenandoah, by indomitable courage, skill, persistence and energy, carried out the plans of his chief. Driven back on Friday, and unable to carry the position on the Saturday, he renewed the attempt in the efforts, and on Sunday he gave the coup-de-grace to the rebellion. The fall of Richmond was not unexpected, but nevertheless much overrated strategic point. Robert Edmund Lee, a man, who of all others, with the exception of Jefferson Davis, is responsible for the miseries for having traitor to his native land and native government.

The discovery of the already famous bronze colossal statue of Hercules, in the courtyard of the Farnese Palace, in Rome, has stimulated to further search on the same locality. The recommencement of excavations, by apparently colossal marble statues have been discovered, and the probability is that many more of the statues are embedded will for some time present themselves. Portions of a colossal foot and leg, of fine bronze, drapery, have also been found, and it is hoped the entire figure may be recovered.

The aesthetics of eating are not well understood. It is regarded too much as a purely physical necessity, as a function whose highest office is to sustain life. Eating should be considered as based upon a good eater as partaking somewhat of the nature of the fine arts, and as capable of being made to rise, involving in a greater or less degree something de-finitely artistic in the social and spiritual nature. The French take a more liberal view of the matter, and their cooking has become a science, the dinner-table a place of intellectual recreation, where the social faculties may be cultivated, and the soul as well as the body refreshed. Their cookery, their festal customs, their writings which touch upon the preparation of dishes, point to this idea. With them cooking and dining have become fine arts, and their professors artists, almost rivalling poets and painters in the esteem which is accorded to them. This view, though capable of being carried to an extreme, is certainly more rational than one more casual one, and the people who entertain it are by living according to that a man may be a gourmand without being a glutton.

QUEEN BESS.

An ancient narration of what it cost Queen Elizabeth for her board, is headed, "A declaration, or brefe collection of one year's expense for all the ordinarie dinners and suppers, with her Majestie breakfast, and breakfaste for the guard, furnished with bread, beere, ale, wyne, sweete meates, and with all manner of victuals of flesh and fish, rated according to the markett prices, at highest and lowest, as there is a moderate what the change of one season of everie dieet is in one dealer, and one to another." The total of fish and 143 fish days, and then for 365 days, being one whole.

"Her Majestie's dieet for breakfaste, dinner and supper is at 6s-8d-day cost £41 7s. 4d., or for 120 days £270 16s. 8d.; on a fish-day £3 cost £9 11s. 0d., making, for 120 days, £12 0s. 8d.; the total amount for the year being £3,564 19s. 8d."

Pretty well for the Queen's Majesty, the difference in the value of money being taken into account, and the cheapness of provisions in those days.

Each of the seven principal officers must had a separate table, the allowance to each being the same, the total cost yearly for each being £66 13s. 6d. The same is to be observed as to the subsequent orders of the Household below:

Lord Steward, Lord Chamberlain, Mr. Treasurer, Mr. Comptroller—A dieet of ten, and ten dishes, dinner and supper for every day, at 5s. 6d.; for one day, £2 15s.; total for one year, £1 0s. 3-4d.; total for one year, £1,002 15s. 0d.

A MONGOL DWELLING.

It is simply the habitation of a Mongol family, and is of the most primitive permanent construction than the ordinary travelling tent. It consists of a frame of light trellis work covered with thick felt, as circular in form, with a conical roof and door, but many that, as hole in the apex of the roof lets out the smoke from the fire over which the food is cooked. The door is left open at night, when the fire is out, and before the inmates are astir in the morning, the hole is covered up. I do not measure the height part of the wall of the tent, but it is under two feet, and you cannot enter without stooping. The tent is about 12 feet in diameter. A piece of felt hanging from the top forms a door. The whole is made light so as to be carried about and put away close. They have no bedding, but keep generally in their clothes, merely loosing their girdles. In addition to the tent, the Mongol is allowed from his rank, which they call "mulching." Such are the dwellings of the Mongols, and to these they attached no luxuries that even when they live in settled communities, as in Pekin, where they are obliged by the Chinese to reside in houses, they still stick to their yurts, merely enclosing them in a high wall enclosing. In the case where the navy did not meet with a single instance of a Mongol tent was a Mongol tent, and what was the use of such a tent?

The Mongols are very superstitious, and certain rules of etiquette have to be observed in riding up to and entering their tents. You must not ride up to the door, but canter the door, for to order a yurt with a whip in the hand is a sign of hostility. Should the master of the house explain this almost in the words: "Am I a dog that you should approach my tent with a whip in your hand?" There is a right and a wrong way of approaching the door. You must not ride up to the door, but out one occasion the uppermost branch of the rein on the left side of the horse's neck, and ride round to the left. The head of the house was outside his yurt when we arrived, and he was the only person we saw during the whole day, but the only response we got was a volley of questions. Why had we come? Were we Russians? repeated in rotation times, as much as to say: "Mongols? Then we will have none of you." We would have left them at once, but ignorant of the rules of civility, which I have since learned, we remained. Would you like to know how you ought to conduct yourselves the gentleman, you had better go round to the back of the house, and there you would find a—but I'm sure, for one house we can communicate your ignorance of these matters.

The furniture of a Mongol yurt is very simple. A chest for the clothing of the family of the four is the only furniture. A huge flat iron pan for cooking, or, if the people are large and rich, a huge cauldron, a small stove, and every one's fireplace, by which means they can cook anything and everything they like at the same time. A house to hold milk, and a good large jug with a spout for the same purpose, and for the convenience of boiling it at the fire while the big pan is on, completes all the kitchen and table service. Each person carries his own wooden cup, or cup, in his bosom, and so much, is ready to partake of whatever is going anywhere; and his small pocketknife, by which he can cut up the joints of another. A wooden box serves as a wardrobe for the whole family. No tables or chairs are necessary, and I found no trace of a solid service. These, with a few mats on the ground, for squatting on by day and sleeping on by night, complete all the social furniture of a yurt.

A GAMBLER.

Among the innumerable anecdotes related of the sum of persons at play, there is one worth relating, which refers to a Mr. Forrest, a gentleman, who, in the reign of Queen Anne, possessed one of the best estates in Northumberland, the whole of which he lost at hazard, in 12 months. According to the story told of this gentleman—for we will call him nothing else—when he had just completed the loss of his last acre, at a gambling-house in London, and was proceeding down the stairs to throw himself into a carriage to convey him home to his estate in the north, he perceived upon having one more throw to try to retrieve his losses, and immediately returned to the room where the play was going on. Servants for the moment being in haste, he insisted that the person he had been playing with should give him a dice box and one solitary throw with him. His proposition was this: That his carriage and horses, his house, and most money in his pocket, his town house, plate and furniture, everything he had left in the world, should be valued in a lump at a certain sum, and be thrown at a single cast. No persuasion could prevail on him to depart from his purpose. Immediately upon the confronting the winner to the door, he told the coachman that he was to return and marched forth into the dark and dismal streets, without home or home, or any other available means of existence. He was, however, invited to an obscure lodging in a cheap part of the town, by a person who had been a constant attendant at the gambler at a billiard table, and occasionally as a helper in divers pastimes, at which the former was skilful. Here he remained during him in the time, exposed to the most severe hardships of the poor, and once even came to the verge compelled by an old friend, who gave him 10 shillings to purchase necessaries. He declined the proffered assistance with the remarking five in possession of the chance of winning back more than he had lost, and then subjected to one of the higher order of honors, he returned to the gaming-house, and, for the first time during the next night, he lost it all, was once more penniless, and after some days died in abject penury and a ragged beggar in St. Giles's.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

A tailor sent his bill to a lawyer for money; the lawyer told him to call again. He did so, and he was running away, but very busy at that time. The boy became saucy, and said to the lawyer, "Master, you said you'd tell your master," said the lawyer, "that it's not convenient to pay it!"

"Yes, sir," answered the boy; "but he bade me tell you that the was not."

Lord Clare, who was much opposed to Curran, one day brought a Newfoundland dog upon the bench, and, addressing the counsel, said, "Curran, I named seide and caressed the animal. Curran stopped.

"Go on, Curran," said the judge.

"O, I beg a thousand pardons," was the rejoinder. "I would suppose your lordship was employed in consultation!"

A retired cheesemonger, who lasted any allusion to the days when he had exhibited, said to Charles Lamb, in course of discussion on the poor Laws, "I am not for doing away with, sir, that I've spent a sort of stuff which you peels call the 'milk of human kindness.'"

Lamb looked at him steadily, and replied: "Yes, I am aware of that; you've turned it all into cheese several years ago!"

It seems that a lawyer is something of a conjurer. In a trial, a pig, with a spade in its snout, got up a case, frame an indictment, engaged a jury, put them to a trial, a witness, hammer a judge, bore a court, and other like things.

There is a matter which greatly interests many people—it is the consequence of marriage between relations. All know the ideas that are commonly entertained on this subject, both in England and in France, but M. Vedelin, of Bale, communicated to the last meeting of the Academy the results of 48 marriages contracted by cousins of different degrees, from which it appears that all these marriages have been fecund, that the offspring live and grow well developed and in good health—in fact, some of the evil consequences which have been attributed to intermarriage have been found to spring from these unions.

HORRIBLE DEATH OF A NUMBER OF FIREMEN AT THE CONFLAGRATION OF THOMAS STREET, BROOKLYN, APRIL 6.—THE ROOF GIVING WAY AND PRECIPITATING THE VICTIMS AMONG THE RUINS OF THE WAREROOMS UNDERNEATH.

GOLDSBORO, N. C.

THE stirring events of the last four years have called into importance many a place only known to its neighbors or found in the gazetteer. Among these is that of which we give a sketch on page 76. Goldsboro', a neat village, is the capital of Wayne county, North Carolina, and is situated on the Neuse river, where it is crossed by the Wilmington and Weldon railroad, 50 miles southeast from Raleigh. It is a very modern town, the first house having been built in 1841. Its birth it began to improve rapidly, until it was, at the breaking out of the present rebellion, one of the most flourishing towns in the State.

The public buildings are new, and remarkably handsome, while steam vessels can ascend to the city with perfect safety. It is the eastern terminus of the North Carolina railroad. Till recently it had three newspapers, and two excellent seminaries, one for males and the other for females. The latter edifice, the most prominent in the sketch we engrave, was used by the rebels, with its numerous outbuildings, as a hospital, and is still used by the 14th corps for that purpose. The courthouse of the town is seen a little to the left of the centre. Its population was about 3,000. It has recently been occupied by Gen. Sherman's army.

HERTFORD, N. C.

This pretty and thriving little town is a post-office of Johnson county, and was the scene of a desperate struggle between a portion of Gen. Sherman's army and the rear of the rebel army on the 31st and 23d of March. Our Artist has given a spirited sketch of a brilliant dash upon the rebel army by a division of the 17th corps, commanded by Gen. Mower. Our Artist speaks with great admiration of the dogged valor of a rebel Captain, who refused to surrender his gun. A sharp encounter ensued between him and one of the Union soldiers, in which the unfortunate rebel got his brains dashed out with the butt end of a musket. The defeat of the rebels is very much attributed to the brilliant charge made upon the rebel lines, by which their right was flanked. When our troops entered it was found that the retreating rebels had fired a large quantity of resin and turpentine. The flames, were, however, subdued before all was destroyed.

PRESIDENT LINCOLN
In Richmond.

THE 3d of April will be long remembered by the inhabitants of Richmond, for on that day President Lincoln entered the rebel capital, just vacated by the mock President Jeff Davis and his broken and dispirited army. Our Artist says: "The President looked pleased, but was evidently not quite recovered from his recent illness. His reception by the crowd was most enthusiastic, of course none of the prominent rebels were there, the assemblage being composed of about an equal proportion of the contraband race and the white. Richmond presents a most melancholy aspect, as so much of the city has been burnt. The principal business part of it is in ruins. There appears to be considerable difference of opinion by whose orders it was fired, one party openly denouncing Brookmidge for giving the order to apply the torch to all the tobacco warehouses as well as the public buildings; while others assert that he tried to avert the calamity. The balance of evidence, however, is against him. After President Lincoln had driven through the principal street, he proceeded to the deserted mansion of the arch-rebel and held a kind of extempore levee, the principal officers being introduced to him by Gen. Weitzel. This elevating ceremony being over, he entered a carriage and was driven through several portions of the city.

"He remarked to some gentlemen present that had he been in stronger health he would have raised the Stars and Stripes over the Capitol with his own hand."

The correspondent of the New York Tribune thus describes this interesting event: "President Lincoln's visit, coming so soon after the occupation, was a matter of intense interest to the entire population. Crowds—thousands—rushed out for a glimpse of his tall figure, as he walked into the city, attended by a few friends and an escort of a score or two of soldiers. The enthusiasm was, however, confined to the negroes, the foreigners, and exceptional Virginia-born citizens. But the joy of the negro knew no bounds. It found expression in whoops, in contortions, in tears, and incessantly in prayerful ejaculations of thanks. The President proceeded to Gen. Weitzel's headquarters, the late residence of Jeff Davis. I do not imagine he went there for the sake of any petty triumph, but simply because it was the headquarters of the General commanding. Many officers and citizens of Richmond came to pay their respects after which he rode about the city. He slept on board one of the gunboats, and afterwards returned to City Point.

"Among the first to seek an interview with the President was Judge Campbell, one of the three Commissioners whom he met at Fortress Monroe. The interview lasted half an hour, and was followed by a second of longer duration the following day. It is known that Judge Campbell considers the whole business of the rebellion, and is only striving for terms. To what extent he is authorised to act for Davis and Lee I do not know, nor is it known what was the President's response."

FIRE AND LOSS OF LIFE
In Brooklyn.

On the 6th inst. a fire broke out in the building, No. 99 Furman street, Brooklyn, and extended to No. 95, entirely consuming the contents of both. These edifices were warehouses, and supported upon their roofs the "hanging gardens" of Brooklyn Heights. A number of firemen endeavored to stand the flames from above, going up the hill into these superincumbent gardens for the purpose, when the iron girders gave way from the heat, and five of the men were precipitated into the blazing ruins and burned to death. Four more were dangerously injured.

RECEPTION OF
The News of the Fall of Richmond in New York.

As soon as the news of the evacuation of Petersburg and the occupation of Richmond by the Federal forces was received in this city, on the morning of the 3d April, a meeting was held on Wall street, in front of the Custom House. Hon. Simeon Draper presided, and read the dispatches from Washington conveying the intelligence.

Patriotic resolutions were then offered by Mr. Prosper M. Wetmore, and adopted with enthusiasm, and it was determined to celebrate the great event in a more deliberate and elegante manner at an early day.

At the tables were also made by Judge Davis, L. E. Chittenden, of the United States Treasury; Peter Cooper, Esq., George Francis Train, Esq., R. B. Connolly, Esq., the Hon. E. G. Ferris, the Rev. W. H. Boole and others. The speech of Mr. L. E. Chittenden, late Register of the U. S. Treasury, appeared to be especially comfortable to the crowd, having reference to the authentic value of our national currency.

The meeting adjourned at three o'clock, with the singing of the doxology, in which the crowd joined.

The Post-Office was decorated with flags, and had a power put up, on which was printed the following notice:

MAILS FOR RICHMOND WILL CLOSE AT ORDERS FROM GEN. GRANT.

Salutes were fired in the City Hall Park and in front of the New England Rooms, No. 135 Broadway.

In the evening the theatres of Washington were illuminated, among them being the New York Press and Tribune buildings, Tammany Hall and Barnum's Museum.

U. S. 7-30 LOAN.

By authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, the undersigned has assumed the General Subscription Agency for the sale of United States Treasury Notes, bearing seven and three tenths per cent. interest per annum, known as the Seven-Thirty Loan.

These Notes are issued under date of June 15th, 1865, and are payable three years after date, in currency, or are convertible at the option of the holder into

U. S. 5-20 Six per cent.

GOLD-BEARING BONDS.

These bonds are worth a premium which increases each year after the 7-30 loan, and its exemption from State and municipal taxation makes it far more per cent. more, according to the rate levied on other property. The interest is payable in currency semi-annually on the coupons attached to each, which may be cut off and sold to any bank or banker.

The interest amounts to

One cent a day on a $50 note.
Two cents " " $100 "
Ten " " " $500 "
20 " " " $1,000 "
$1 " " " $5,000 "

Notes of all the denominations named will be promptly furnished upon receipt of subscriptions, and the next installment will be required to 15th June next will be paid in advance. This is now offered by the Government, and it is confidently expected that the subscription will be filled at par.

Great Popular Loan of the People,

Less than $300,000,000 of the Loan authorized by the last Congress are now on the market. This amount, at the rate at which it is being absorbed, will all be subscribed for within four weeks. Subscription can also be made through correspondents at a premium, as has uniformly been the case on closing the subscriptions to other Loans.

In order that citizens of every town and section of the country may be afforded facilities for taking the Loan, the National Banks, State Banks, and Private Bankers throughout the country have generally agreed to receive subscriptions, and deposit them to the credit of their own agents, in whom they have confidence, and who only are to be responsible for the delivery of the notes for which they receive orders.

J. COOKE,
Subscription Agent,
Philadelphia.

ARRANDALE & CO., Manufacturers' Agents,
No. 167 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Announce that all the above list of goods will be sold for One Dollar each.

In consequence of the great stagnation of trade in the manufacturing districts of England, through the war having cut off the supply of cotton, a large quantity of Valuable Jewellery, originally intended for the English market, has been sent off for sale in this country, and MUST BE SOLD AT ANY SACRIFICE!

Under these circumstances, ARRANDALE & CO., acting as Agents for the principal European Manufacturers, have resolved upon a Great Gift Distribution, subject to the following regulations:

Certificates of the various articles are first put into envelopes, sealed up and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance.

On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you are to have, and then it is at your option to send the dollar and take the article or not. Purchasers may thus obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, or any Set of Jewellery on our list for ONE DOLLAR.

Send 25 Cents for Certificate.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be enclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for 10; and a hundred for $15.

Agents.—We want agents in every regiment, and in every town and county in the country, and those acting as such will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered for them, provided their remittance amounts to One Dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents by every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage Stamps. ARRANDALE & CO.,
167 Broadway, New York.

What the "Press" say of Us.

Great Gift Distribution.—A rare opportunity is offered for obtaining watches, chains, diamond rings, silverware, etc., by Messrs. Arrandale & Co., at No. 167 Broadway. They have an immense stock of articles, varying in value, and all are offered for $1 each. The distribution is very fairly done—you agree to take a certificate of a certain article, enclosed in an envelope, and are not required to pay your dollar unless you are satisfied with the article, which will certainly be worth more than that amount, and may be $50 or $100. An excellent mode this of investing a dollar.—Sunday Times, New York City, Feb. 19, 1865.

Messrs. Arrandale & Co. have long been personally known to us, and we believe them to be every way worthy of public confidence.—New York Scottish American Journal, June 11, 1864.

We have inspected, at the office of Arrandale & Co.'s Agency for European Manufacturing Jewellery, a large assortment of fashionable and valuable jewellery of the newest patterns. We also noticed a large quantity of silver-plate, and understand that the whole of these newly-imported articles are to be disposed of on a novel principle, giving great advantages to buyers, and affording extensive employment to agents. We know the firm in question to be a very respectable and thoroughly worthy of public confidence, and recommend our friends to read their advertisement.—New York Albion, Sept. 3, 1864.

By Messrs. Arrandale & Co 's arrangement, the advantages must be on the side of the customer, for he has everything to gain, and nothing comparatively to lose. He knows what he will get for his dollar beforehand, and he need not send it if he is not satisfied.—New York Weekly News, Aug. 6, 1864.

Employment for Ladies.—The most eligible and profitable employment we have heard of for ladies is the sale of certificates for the "Great Gift Distribution" of Arrandale & Co. A lady of our acquaintance has been very successful in this way, not only filling her own purse, but also in doing a good turn to those to whom she sold the Certificates, as will be seen from our advertising columns. Gentlemen can also be thus engaged.—New York Sunday Mercury, Aug. 14, 1864.

In our columns the reader will find an advertisement of Arrandale & Co.'s Gift Distribution of watches, jewellery and silver-ware. In payment of that advertisement we received several sets of the jewellery advertised, and we are warranted in saying that, both in finish and quality, they quite exceeded our expectations. They turned out to be just what they had been represented.—True Democrat (Lewistown), Aug. 17, 1864.

The British Whig of Kingston, C. W., says, Nov. 26, 1864, one of our lady subscribers became an agent for Arrandale & Co., and by request brought some 20 articles, sent as prizes for her agency, to this office for inspection, and without hesitation we can state that each and all of the articles were worth treble the amount of cost to the recipients, and some of them six times.

ARCANA WATCH.
An Elegant Novelty in Watches.

The cases of this watch are an entirely new invention, composed of six different metals combined, rolled together and polished, producing an exact imitation of 18 carat gold, called Arcana, which will always keep its color. They are as beautiful and durable as solid gold, and are afforded at one-sixth the cost. The case is beautifully designed, with Fluted and Shield Centers, with Patent Push Pin, and engraved in the exact style of the celebrated Gold Hunting Levers, and are both handsome and desirable, and so exact an imitation of gold, as to defy detection. The movement is manufactured by the well-known St. Imier Watch Company of Europe, and are very highly finished, having improved jewelers, fancy carved bridges, adjusting regulator, with gilt dial and figures, improved patent pendulum setting, with fine dial and skeleton hands, and is warranted a good time-keeper. These watches are of the usual size, the smallest being for ladies, and are all Hunting Cases. Each watch will be sent in a neat morocco case for $15. A single one sent in an elegant Morocco Case for $25, will satisfy all for those unacquainted with it. For the sole agents for the watch in the United States, and none can genuine which do not bear our Trade Mark.

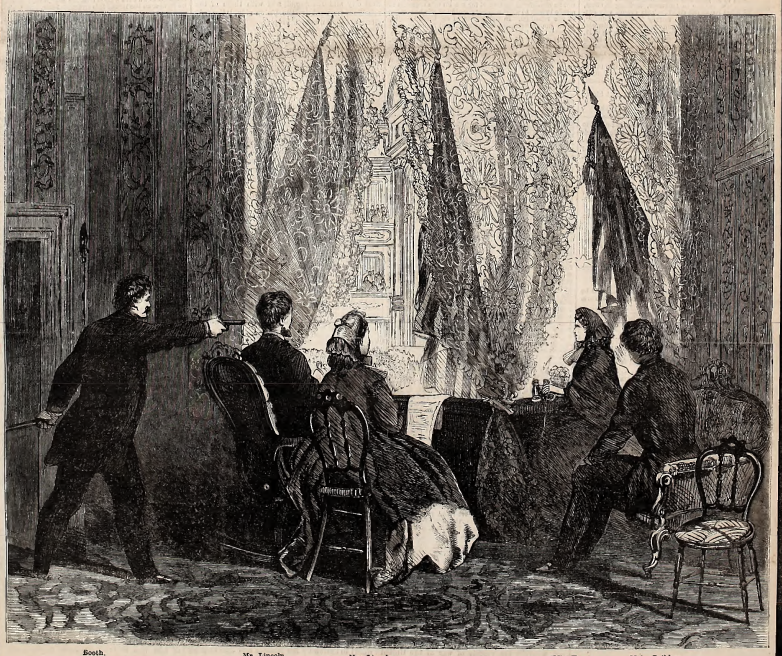
ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Assassinated Good Friday, 1865.

BY EDMUND C. STEDMAN.



"Forgive them, for they know not what they do!"
He said, and so went shriven to his fate—
Unknowing went, that generous heart and true.
Even while he spoke the slayer lay in wait,
And when the morning opened Heaven's gate
There passed the whitest soul a nation knew.
Henceforth all thoughts of pardon are too late;
They, in whose cause that arm its weapon drew,
Have murdered MERCY. Now alone shall stand
Blind JUSTICE, with the sword unsheathed she wore.
Hark, from the eastern to the western strand,
The swelling thunder of the people's roar:
What words they murmur—PETER, NOT HER HAND!
SO LET IT SHUT, SUCH DEEDS SHALL BE NO MORE!
N. Y. Tribune.

The Martyr President.

On the 14th of April, 1861, the flag of the United States went down on the beleaguered walls of Fort Sumter. Its little garrison of seventy men succumbed to the thousands traitors who had been permitted to pile up, unmolested, battery on battery around it, and the treason nursed so long in South Caroline had there its first triumph. The rebellion, then commenced in cowardice, ended on the fourth anniversary of that eventful day in assassination. Every step in its progress had been marked by some crime more heinous than the last. Persecution and murder of men and women for their adhesion to the flag of their fathers; Fort Pillow massacres; systematic starvation of Union prisoners; plots to burn crowded cities, and to dash railway trains down precipices, to say nothing of wholesale incendiarism on the high seas, have been among the common incidents of the war on the part of the South, and have passed into history as the characteristics of the rebellion. But one thing was necessary to complete the deep damnation of the monster treason of the 19th century. That hideous culmination was achieved on the night of April 14th, 1865, when ABRAHAM LINCOLN, the loved and honored head of the nation, was slain by a rebel assassin! Slain while unarmed and unsuspicious, slain from behind, with every incident that could lend a darker hue to the atrocity of the act. Almost at the same moment, a maimed and wasted statesman, helpless on a couch of suffering in a dimly-lighted sick chamber, was assaulted and stabbed by another foul emissary of the monster crime! Nor was there a single accessory of cowardice and brutality wanting here. Nothing indeed was wanting in the design, scope and execution of both acts, to invest them with a character more horrid and repulsive than attaches to any similar events in the wide annals of murder! The commencement, the progress, and the close of the rebellion—treason, wanton barbarity, assassination! Unrelieved by a single trait, lightened up by no single act of generosity, it stands in history one black, hideous blotch on civilization and mankind! Posterity will regard it, even through the haze of time, with a shudder, and parallels for its atrocities will only be found in the records of the darker days of the French Revolution, or in the bloody traditions of Dahomey!

Abraham Lincoln has joined the noble army of Freedom's Martyrs. "Christ died to make men holy; he died to make men free!" When that great, kind, expansive heart ceased to beat, humanity lost not alone its first representative man, but mankind lost its truest and best friend. Even the red-handed, dismayed and shrinking traitors of the South found room in his broad sympathies, and a mercy there which perhaps encroached on God's first attribute of justice. Passing strange that the two men highest in position in the nation, and most disposed to leniency and forgiveness, were those that this hell-born treason selected for its last and most distinguished victims! Did Heaven order that its ultimate act should be to shut fast and bar for ever the half-opened door of national sympathy? Did Providence frown on the possible weakness that would condone treason and betray the cause for which five hundred thousand of our brothers have died and still fester in unconfined graves!

Far be it from us to attempt lightly to interpret the inscrutable ways of the Almighty, but it seems to us that His right arm has been so often made bare in this long and direful struggle that we may humbly, reverently and in confidence seek to know the meaning of this great and unexpected visitation. Let each man reflect for himself, and act on the faith which those reflections may inspire. The death of Mr. Lincoln brings to the Presidency a man intimately acquainted with the origin, the spirit and the history of the rebellion, who knows its secret springs, and has an experimental knowledge of its character and purposes superior to that of any man living. It brings to the head of the nation and the control of its power a man annealed, and whose predominant characteristics are stern determination and inflexible justice. His career and history have shown him to be a man of undaunted courage, untiring perseverance, fixed adhesion to principle, and warm sympathy with the elevation of mankind and the vindication of its rights. A single and venial error alone tarnishes the bright escutcheon of Andrew Johnson of Tennessee, and to that the eyes of the nation are now and will be for ever closed. Mr. Johnson will call around him men who have vindicated their capacity in the different branches of public service or in the walks of private life, and who possess the confidence of the country, and we have full faith that his Administration will rank in dignity, statesmanship and loftiness, as well as firmness of policy, with the best of our history. Under it we feel sure we shall not, through mistaken concessions and the dictates of a weak sentimentality, slip back into the slough from which we have just emerged. The prize won at such cost of blood and treasure will not be allowed to fall from our grasp for want of nerve in the Executive arm.

All that was mortal of Abraham Lincoln, the man of the people, the tried but always faithful President, will soon be consigned to the grave; but that grave will be the Mecca of a great nation, and will divide the reverential tribute of mankind with that which has made Mount Vernon holy, and a shrine before which all good men bow, as before the symbol of our faith and the emblem of our salvation.

A Double Number.

WE shall issue next week a double number of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER. It will contain portraits of the late President Lincoln, President Johnson, Mr. Secretary Seward, Mr. Frederick Seward, &c. Also a complete and accurate series of illustrations of all the places, scenes and incidents connected with the murder of President Lincoln, and the attempted assassination of Mr. Seward. Also views of the funeral scenes and ceremonies in the White House, in Washington, and the principal cities of the country. To prevent disappointment, orders should be sent immediately.

ARTISTIC ACCURACY.

WE present to our readers below conclusive and unsolicited evidence of the accuracy of our engraving of the scene at the deathbed of President Lincoln:

WASHINGTON, D. C., 453 10th street,
Sunday, April 16, 1865.

We, the undersigned, inmates of No. 453 10th street, Washington, D. C., the house in which President Abraham Lincoln died, and being present at the time of his death, do hereby certify that the sketches taken by Mr. Albert Berghaus, Artist for LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER, are correct.

The President and his Policy.

THE sentiments of President Johnson have now a value and significance which did not attach to them ten days ago. We present below an extract from a speech made by him from the steps of the War Department, in Washington, on the 3d of April, at an impromptu meeting, on the occasion of the receipt of the news of the fall of Richmond. It will be seen that he is not one of those who prate and potter about peace and the reconstruction of the "Union as it was," nor does he concede anything to those word-formulas, through which adroit treason now seeks to mislead and deceive the public mind, allay apprehension and soothe the nation into the most fatal of concessions, namely, that treason is not the most heinous of crimes, and above all others deserving of severe and condign punishment, but a weakness perhaps, possibly a folly, but at worst a venial offence easily excusable. The loyal people of the United States view with equal disgust and dismay the spread of these heresies, and they will rejoice to learn, from President Johnson himself, that they find no tolerance with him. If Toombs, Davis, Benjamin, Breckinridge and their fellow-conspirators escape punishment, then indeed has "justice fled to brutish beasts, and men have lost their reason." On the occasion referred to Mr. Johnson spoke as follows:

"It may not be entirely out of place for me to state that at the commencement of this iniquitous rebellion I was one who entered the service, not as a three months, a six months, a twelve months or a three years man, but as one enlisted for the war or during the struggle for the suppression of the rebellion; and I trust it will not be considered egotistical for me on this occasion to allude briefly to what was my position at the beginning of the rebellion. In the Senate of the United States, when the conspiracy was matured, and Senators were retiring from their seats, when I was called upon to say what I would do in the matter, my reply was that Gen. Jackson, while President of the United States in 1832 and 1833, declared that traitors should be hung as high as Haman's gallows, and then he would put his foot upon treason and crush it out. That old man now sleeps in the tomb, and were it possible to communicate intelligence to the dead, and he could be made to know that traitors and treason were rampant in the land, it would cause him to turn in his coffin and burst its lid, and rise from the tomb and shake off the habiliments of the dead, and again reiterate that memorable sentence, that 'The Union of the States must be preserved.' When asked what I would do, I said I would arrest them as traitors, I would try them as traitors, commit them as traitors, and hang them as traitors. And in this connection I will say that, taking into account the persecution, oppression and banishment from all that is sacred and dear to men, that the traitors—that is, the leading traitors, who have deceived and involved the nation in this diabolical rebellion—I should say that their reward should be the halter and gallows. I repeat, that conscious, intelligent, leading traitors should suffer the penalty of death. And, on the other hand, to the people who have been deluded and misled, I would extend leniency and humanity, and an invitation to return to the allegiance they owe to the country. We have the gratifying intelligence to-day that the outpost of the Southern Confederacy has been taken. In addition to that the gates of the citadel have been entered by our victorious forces. May we not infer that it is a rebuke of Divine Providence against a proud and imperious class when we see that their city was entered by colored troops? In this great cause of human freedom it is the pride of my life that I have been permitted to participate in labors that have, under God, tended to achieve this glorious result. And while I have been laboring to remove this disturbing element from the country, I trust I may be permitted to say I have labored equally well for the emancipation of the white man as for the sable sons, and acknowledge the supremacy of the Constitution and obedience to the law. We have intelligence by the telegraph that our flag waves in triumph over the dome of the Confederate Capitol. May not I be permitted, on this occasion, to indulge substantially in the language of another, in referring to the Stars and Stripes of our country, which now waves in triumph, that it may continue to rise higher and higher, until it meets the sun in his coming, and may departing day linger and play upon its ample folds. But I did not intend, gentlemen, to speak or occupy your time half so long as I have, and I will now, in conclusion, tender you my sincere thanks for this manifestation of regard and respect that you have displayed in calling upon one who so little expected it on the present occasion. But permit me, in conclusion, to propose three cheers for the President of the United States, his Cabinet officers, and the gallant officers, and especially to the soldiers, who have fought our battles, and achieved the victories out of which comes this day's rejoicing. I would say, in this connection, that while the functionaries of our Government have done much in carrying out the war, that it is the people that have constituted the former, and through their functionaries have put down this, the most gigantic rebellion the world has ever seen. My opinion is, it is the work of destiny, and I am compelled on this occasion to recur to the old ad captandum saying, or, as considered by some, that 'the voice of the people is the voice of God,' and that their voices being reflected through the proper channels, that has saved and preserved, and will perpetuate the Government through all time. I repeat, I thank you, gentlemen, for this kind manifestation of your regard and respect."

AT the outset of the war most foreign nations (all of them sympathising more or less with the rebellion), taking advantage of Mr. Seward's blunder in declaring certain Southern ports in a state of blockade, instead of declaring them closed to commerce, hastened to concede what is called "belligerent rights" to the rebels—that is to say, to recognise them as on an equality with the United States in all belligerent matters. And they issued orders in council, decrees, edicts and what not, whereby the vessels of war of the United States and the piratical craft of the South (most of them built, fitted, manned and armed in their own ports), were put in a common category as regards entering their harbors, repairing, coaling, etc. But it is a little wonderful that all rigidity of rule was waived in case of Southern cruisers (heaven save the mark)! while they were sternly enforced as regards the war vessels of a powerful and friendly nation. Well, this sort of pretended neutrality has gone on up to this time, until the rebellion has not got a single merchant-vessel-burning craft on the seas, except the Franco-Dano-Hispano monster, the ultimate designation of which is "Stonewall." The President has made up his mind that this Aminadab Sleek sort of neutrality on the part of our trans-Atlantic friends shall cease, and has issued his proclamation declaring that all war vessels of foreign nations shall be treated in our ports precisely as ours are treated in theirs. If insults and "pains and penalties" are to be inflicted on our ships, and through them on us, we shall pay off the treatment "in kind." It is a case of Jonathan showing his teeth, and if our enemies (for we do not suppose we have a Government in Europe that is our friend) like the looks of the "ivories," they can easily prove their quality. We are glad the President has taken this step while our army and navy are intact, and before the suggestions of economy, the love of peace, and the possible occupation of the public mind in the question of reconstruction shall have turned men's thoughts from foreign affairs, which are always of secondary importance. If any nation wants a war with the United States, it can by gratified on the shortest notice, and on the smallest kind of a pretext. Blood's up! and we stand no nonsense! Away with your "belligerent rights," cant and humbug, and own up late, but in time, that all your selfish sympathies, secret collusions, open aid and wanton and disloyal conduct against us, have been alike unavailing to break up the American Union. Treat us again as "great and good friends," and we will agree, however strong may be the temptation, not to imitate the conduct of the worthy Sacristan in the Ingoldsby Legends, who "put his thumb upon his nose and spread his fingers out." We may consider that kind of diminutive gymnastics appropriate, but will, nevertheless, accept with such gravity as the circumstances will permit, and past events justify, any "assurances of distinguished consideration and profound respect" that trans-Atlantic Governments may offer. With the lights of the past we shall not mistake their value, nor fail to appreciate their sincerity.

IN the reports of the battles before and around Petersburg which terminated in the downfall of that city and Richmond, and with them of the rebellion, we read, on the Union side, "the only General killed was Winthrop:"

"What? Laurel round the flag?
Then there's a victory won;
But what the price? What stars have sunk
With the setting of the sun?

"No stars, but heaps of slain,
And men of much renown,
The wearer of one hard-earned star
Has gone to wear a crown."

IT was all very fine to kill the fatted calf for the son who had simply gone off, without trying to burn down his father's house, and without trying to drive a bayonet into his breast. But if he had exerted his utmost power, in the most malignant spirit, to do both these things, to say nothing of starving and murdering his brothers, the poetical beauty of killing the fatted calf and going out to meet the errant child with open arms, might suffer a slight derogation.

A correspondent of a daily evening paper pithily says:

"We are taught those who turn and repent shall be forgiven; but what shall we do with those who have cut down their fellow-citizens unarmed because they were true to their country? What shall we do with those who, from malignant hate, have deliberately tortured our prisoners to death? What shall we do with men who, with oaths of fealty and to support the Constitution, sat long years in Washington planning and plotting treason? Shall these men who have, in the face of their oaths to support the Constitution, devoted every energy to its destruction, be allowed with pride, pomp and power to come back and sit in Washington side by side with the men whose son was starved in rebel pens? Shall those who first stole the guns and munitions of the United States, and then used them against their owner and proprietor to kill and destroy, be trusted to command loyal men?

"Old King David tried a very able general, one who never lost a battle, named Joab. On a certain occasion the king's son had raised a rebellion to take the crown and dethrone his good old father. Joab was disposed to take the responsibility of dealing with traitors a little after his own fashion. So when Absalom was found fast in the boughs of an oak he shot a few darts through his heart.

"When David mourned over the death of his son more than he rejoiced in the faithfulness and valor of his troops, and the stability of his throne, Joab, in language very pithy but slightly profane, remonstrated with the king, and said: 'Thou hast shamed this day the faces of all thy servants which have this day saved thy life and the life of the sons, in that thou lovest thine enemies and hatest thy friends.'

"I hope the Government officers at Washington will consider seriously whether a man who has violated the oath of office once can be safely trusted, when his wishes and designs have undergone no change, and he stops his treason merely from inability to carry it further.

"Shall the traitor who helped hunt his Union neighbor through swamps with bloodhounds, and who shot and hung those who were true and faithful, be sent to Washington by a slight secesh majority to make laws in Congress for these Union sufferers? Let us see how it will work. An act of Congress is asked to pay for the loss of a house or barn by a battle, the property of a rebel. The Union man, whose life was taken, whose family was robbed, whose house was burned, and his acres turned over to a Confederate, finds none to plead the cause of his wronged orphan children. Shall the brigand whose freebooting life made him a terror to all his neighbors be the maker of laws?"

A DAILY contemporary has a good suggestion, to the effect that some enterprising publisher should bring out a selection of passages from the London Times and its correspondents relating to our war—warnings, suggestions and prophecies. There would be rich "pickings" from the files of 1860-61, when John Bull was instructed (that's the word) to button-up his pockets and lend nothing to the rascally Yankees, and from the issues for May and June prox., in which we are sure to be told that all sensible men from the start foresaw the result of the war iniquitously provoked by the rascally Southerners. Our contemporary suggests that the motto for this collection of excerpts might appropriately be:

"The Times is out of joint, with cursed spite."

LIEUT.-GEN. ROBERT E. LEE, late Commander-in-Chief of the rebel forces, is the son of Gen. Henry Lee, of Revolutionary memory, and known as "Light Horse Harry," whose mother was the beautiful Miss Grimes, Gen. Washington's first love, and whom he celebrated as "the lowland beauty." Gen. Harry Lee was twice married. By the first marriage he had two children, Henry (an officer in the war of 1812) and Lucy. By the second wife—a Miss Carter, of Shirley—he had five children, two daughters, Anne and Mildred, and three sons. The sons were Charles Carter, Robert Edmund (the General), and Sidney Smith, the last-named an officer in our service, and now in the rebel navy. Gen. Lee was born in 1808, and is consequently 57 years of age. He graduated second in his class, in 1829, and was assigned to the Engineer Corps as second lieutenant; in 1835 Assistant Astronomer, for fixing the boundary between Ohio and Michigan; in 1836 promoted first lieutenant; captain in 1838; chief engineer under Scott, in Mexico, and greatly distinguished himself, being promoted successively by merit, major, lieutenant-colonel and colonel, for his gallantry; in 1852 superintendent Military Academy; in 1855 transferred as lieutenant-colonel of the new regiment of cavalry; March 16th, 1851, promoted colonel of the 1st cavalry; resigned April 25th following, and reluctantly embarked in the rebellion. Surrendered to Gen. Grant, April, 1865.

WE find in an exchange what purports to be the valedictory proclamation of Mr. Jefferson Davis. The fact that it is dated "April 1st, 1865," seems to throw some doubt on its authenticity. We extract the "points:"

"To such persons as are in arms against the Confederate States of America, I do hereby tender absolute amnesty, on condition that they forthwith desist from annoying our patriotic population.

"Under the circumstances, slavery had better be abolished.

"To the foreign subscribers to the Confederate loan I return sincere thanks.

"Major-General Grant, United States army, will please see that they get their cotton.

"It is not altogether improbable that the glorious experiment of a slaveholders' Confederacy may yet prove a delusion and a snare. I have often thought so. So has General Lee, who has lately been fighting mostly for his last year's salary. The Confederate treasury being light, I think I will take it in my valise. General Lee thinks that we have a good opening before us, and that we have seen the last of this fratricidal war. I hope so. Stephens thinks peace more imminent than ever.

"If the United States persists in refusing to recognise the Confederacy, on my return I shall again urge the arming of the negroes."

THE words uttered by Mr. Everett in his celebrated oration at Gettysburg are invested with peculiar interest and significance at the present time:

"The people of loyal America will never take to their confidence, or admit again to a share in their Government, the hard-hearted men whose cruel lust of power has brought this desolating war upon the land, but there is no personal bitterness felt even against them. They may live, if they can bear to live after wantonly causing the death of so many thousand fellow-men; they may live in safe obscurity beneath the shelter of the Government they have sought to overthrow, or they may fly to the protection of the Governments of Europe—some of them are already there, seeking, happily in vain, to obtain the aid of foreign Powers in furtherance of their own treason. There let them stay. The humblest dead soldier that lies cold and stiff in his grave before us is an object of envy beneath the clods that cover him, in comparison with the living man who is willing to grovel at the feet of a foreign throne for assistance in compassing the ruin of his country.

"But the hour is coming, and now is, when the power of the leaders of the rebellion to delude and inflame must cease. There is no bitterness on the part of the masses. The people of the South are not going to wage an eternal war for the wretched pretexts by which this rebellion is sought to be justified. The bonds that unite us as one people, a substantial community of origin, language, belief and law (the four great ties that bind the societies of men together); common national and political interests; a common history; a common pride in a glorious ancestry; a common interest in this great heritage of blessings; the very geographical features of the country; the mighty rivers that cross the lines of climate, and thus facilitate the interchange of natural and industrial products; while the wonder-working arm of the engineer has levelled the mountain walls which separate the East and West, compelling your own Alleghanies, my Maryland and Pennsylvania friends, to open wide their everlasting doors to the chariot wheels of traffic and travel—these bonds of union are of perennial force and energy, while the causes of alienation are imaginary, factitious and transient. The heart of the people North and South is for the Union. Indications, too plain to be mistaken, announce the fact, both in the east and the west of the States in rebellion. In North Carolina and Arkansas the fatal charm at length is broken. At Raleigh and Little Rock the lips of honest and brave men are unsealed, and an independent press is unlimbering its artillery. The weary masses of the people are yearning to see the dear old flag floating again upon the capitols, and they sigh for the return of the peace, prosperity and happiness which they enjoyed under a Government whose power was felt only in its blessings."

THE inauguration of Mr. Vice-President Johnson as President of the United States took place, without ostentation, in his rooms at the Kirkwood House in Washington, a few hours after the death of Mr. Lincoln. The oath was administered by Chief-Justice Chase in the presence of Secretary McCulloch, of the Treasury Department; Attorney-General Speed, F. P. Blair, Sr., Hon. Montgomery Blair, Senators Foote, of Vermont; Ramsay, of Minnesota; Yates, of Illinois; Stewart, of Nevada; Hale, of New Hampshire, and General Farnsworth, of Illinois. On the conclusion of the ceremony Mr. Johnson said:

"The duties of the office of President are mine. I will perform them. The consequences are with God. Gentlemen, I shall lean upon you. I feel that I shall need your support. I am deeply impressed with the solemnity of the occasion and the responsibility of the duties I am assuming."

THE men who compassed the death of the all too-kind and merciful Lincoln—did they ever read of him who said: "My little finger shall be thicker than my father's loins; my father chastised you with whips, I will chastise you with scorpions!" By their own act they have exchanged Lincoln for Johnson, and on them will fall the full weight of the consequences. "Spare them not" is alike the voice of God and the people.

SOME persons in Washington seem to suppose that the rebellion was a harmless freak of erratic politicians, who are to be welcomed back, now their little eccentricities are ended! Upon this matter the soldiers and the people will have a word to say in due season.

Summary of the War.

There are no military operations since our last to report, with the exception of a dispatch by the way of Cairo, announcing that Mobile had been occupied by the Union troops on the 9th of April. The rebel force which garrisoned the city escaped up the river in gunboats, but Spanish Fort had been obliged to surrender with 3,000 men. The dispatch states that over 300 guns had fallen into our possession.

FOREIGN NEWS.

FROM Europe we learn that Richard Cobden, the eminent English Reformer, died in London, April 2.

The American Minister at Lisbon had demanded an explanation from the Portuguese Government for firing at the United States war vessels, the Niagara and Sacramento. It seems that Fort Belem fired seven shots at our vessels before they came to an anchor.

TOWN GOSSIP.

WE had a walk, not many centuries ago, down Broadway. The weather was blue, balmy, Italian, and, to top off with a poetical expression, decent. It was after lunch, and afternoon. We had been drawing some petroleum dividends; and they lay, in a roll of notes in which a little of the original oil seemed to have become involved, in the pocket nearest our heart. The pavement was crowded; it was crowded with magnificent girls; that lady whom we have sometimes craftily disguised under a respectful title and a personal pronoun, was far, far away, and the girls were really magnificent. We never were so happy. One lady had a beautiful little jewelled snake in her bonnet; another had two sharp triangular patches of pink on her cheeks, and we thought she must have been descended from a clown at the circus; another had what they call the "rats" transfixed with a little duck of a dagger; it seemed as if some Hamlet had made his fatal pass behind the veil, and shouted again, "A rat! a rat!" A few of these elegant apparitions dragged a very heavy palisade of very filthy fluted flounces, and we understood they were in the service of the street-cleaning people; but more were looped up so as to exhibit the latest caprice of the Balmoral skirt, and presented the general appearance of penwipers; and of these last we boldly declare that we saw the ankles.

It is here that we wish to stop and muse. Now, ladies, there is no use. If you are not going to learn how to set down a foot and how to pick it up again, you had better drop all the drapery once more and re-enter the street-cleaning persuasion. Under the rule of the First Consul, the rage for classical ideas brought back the scanty tunic of Diana and Minerva; but then, the French ladies were able to stand and step like Minervas and Dianas. Their skirts, with the exquisite gold edges, withdrew some inches from contact with the ground; but the highbred spring of the insteps was a pleasure to watch, as they elastically bent and rose, and bent and rose with the walk. Do you suppose Pauline Bonaparte either turned in her toes, or pounded with her heels, or did parallel exercises with the edges of her soles, as you are all doing? Do you suppose her sandals wore out first at the uppers, because her little toes twisted over and got upon the pavement? Go up to the guilty closet, you absurd little Bluebeards, and let the soles of your abused slippers preach to you for the reformation of your daily walk and the healing of your slipshod gait and gaiters. A shoe, my lady, should never wear out very much faster in one part than another; indeed, if ideal perfection were to be attained in this world, we imagine that our leathers would proceed through their allotted course without any local exhibition of weakness—only a "general flavor of mild decay," such as was noticed in that one-horse vehicle which finally dropped all at once into a little hill of dust because it was all over just as strong as everywhere. Be that as it may, fair dames, if you will wear Etruscan jewellery, and furnish your rooms with Greek vases, you had better try to imbibe a little of the old Hellenic grace, and never mind how low you let it settle in your fair frames—that is, if you are going to continue your sensible habit of festooning the drapery.

We fear we have already provoked as much wrath as it will be convenient to carry in a week, otherwise we should have a mild word or two to say about the carriage of the torso. How few of us are able to hit just the proper mean between stiffness and undignified lassitude. The fault is perhaps more common with the boys than the girls; we saw terribly few "fellows" in our walk who carried their shoulders just as we may suppose the young Paris or Telemachus bore theirs. Many slouched; some seemed to be carrying invisible burdens: some pert youths shot up some inches to one side or another after each step, behaving like the float on a fishing line during the administration of a nibble; some rode on their feet as if the latter were springless carriage-bodies; and in some the head, or rather the chin, seemed to contain the active principle, and appeared to drag the whole baggage of clothes and flesh after it. How few had a motion like the back of a proud, undulating, invertebrate wave, as it will rise, travel and bow among its mates in the procession that attends the journey of the moon.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The State Department, in the Washington celebration, made a transparent exhibition of Mr. Seward's foreign policy in the briefest of maxims: "At home Union is order, and order is peace—abroad, Union is strength, and strength is peace." Foreign papers please copy.

—— On the 5th inst. messages were sent direct from New York to San Francisco, a distance of nearly 4,000 miles; the largest length of wire ever worked over one circuit. The wires worked well, though it rained at several points on the line.

—— Idaho is the largest territory in the United States yet organized. It is 700 miles long and 450 miles broad, and has an area of 326,373 square miles.

—— Bishop L. L. Hamlin, of the M. E. Church, died at Mount Pleasant, Iowa, on the 23d ult. He had been ill during the entire winter. He was one of the most eminent divines and prominent leaders of the Methodist denomination.

—— Mrs. Catherine Brarenberger, of Pittsburg, has recovered $3,250 damages from Dr. George Cleis, in consequence of his negligence or lack of skill in treating her husband's broken leg. The wound was patched up, and the man died from the effects of gangrene.

—— The Richmond women are nearly all dressed in mourning. Sad have been the ravages of death in Virginia. Yesterday (says a correspondent) I visited the cemetery, and the vast space now occupied—for it has been enlarged to nearly twice its size—contains 60,000 new graves. Hardly any tombstones have been erected during the last four years. Even the grave of President Tyler is unmarked by anything but a modest inscription.

—— Mr. John Dorr, of Cherryfield, Me., has six sons and two grandsons in the Union army. A seventh son offered to enlist, but was rejected by a recruiting officer on account of having lost the fingers of his right hand.

—— During the last three years the shipbuilders of Mystic, Conn., have been engaged most exclusively in building sidewheel and screw steamers; but this year sailing vessels will take the precedence.

—— As an evidence of the good results of judicious advertising, the editor of the Boston Advertiser says: "It will be remembered that we advertised a lost portmonnaie last week. Before our paper was fairly circulated we found it—in the pocket of a coat we don't usually wear."

—— At the opening of the April term of the United States Court, at Cincinnati, the lawyers practising therein were required to take the oath of loyalty prescribed in the act of July, 1862. Nineteen in all took the oath, two of them making some technical protests. George E. Pugh declined to take it immediately, stating that he believed it unconstitutional, and desired time to consider the subject. W. M. Corry refused entirely, and immediately surrendered up the business which he had in hand in the court.

—— At an enthusiastic meeting of the citizens of Hartford, Conn., to celebrate the glorious Union victories, a silver half dollar was put up at auction, and, being sold and re-sold, brought $1,217 for the Sanitary and Christian Commissions. The last bid was $525. Mr. N. Kingsbury was the generous purchaser.

—— Brevet Brig.-Gen. Frederick Winthrop, of New York city, was killed at the battle of Five Forks. He joined the 71st New York regiment in the three months' service, at the beginning of the war, and fought at Bull Run. In October, 1861, he was appointed Captain in the 12th U. S. Infantry (regulars), and continued in service until the battles of the Wilderness, last summer, when he was appointed Colonel of the 5th New York regiment, and was shortly afterwards breveted Brigadier-General for gallantry in the field. In the battle of Five Forks he commanded 1st brigade, 2d division of of the 5th corps. His age was 25 years. The remains were brought to this city for interment. Gen. Winthrop was a cousin of the late Major Theodore Winthrop, and of Robert C. Winthrop, of Boston.

—— "No man living," says Judge French, "can show a good orchard of grafted fruit which was kept in grass the first ten years of its life. It is a point settled beyond controversy that orchards, to be healthy and productive, must be cultivated most of the time."

—— An officer of the 20th Connecticut regiment writes that our troops, on their march through South Carolina, captured the Bank of Charleston on wheels, moving to a place of safety. It had a large amount of gold and of Confederate bonds.

—— The Louisville Journal says: "A Boston physician has discovered that gold has medicinal virtues. So, the yellow metal, we suppose, is to become a drug."

—— The Missouri State Convention has adjourned. The new constitution (abolishing slavery) was passed by a vote of 38 to 13. It is to be voted upon by the people on the 6th of June, and if ratified will go into effect on the 4th of July. The soldiers will vote upon it in camp.

—— A number of empty bottles have been thrown into the sea on the west coast of Africa, and have been picked up on the Irish coast. One has been found after 16 years, another after 14, and a third after 10 years. One was thrown into the Caribbean Sea, and after five days was picked up 210 miles distant. A bottle was thrown in at Behring's Straits, and 200 days afterwards was found on the Honduras coast, having travelled 3,500 miles.

—— It is strange to say that the mail steamer which took out to Professor Bond, the Director of the Observatory of Harvard College and the Astronomer-in-Chief of the United States, the highest honor of the Royal Astronomical Society of England, the gold medal, crossed another, on its return to England, which conveyed to the same society the record of the Professor's untimely and much-lamented death.

—— The final hymn, sent up on a slip from J. D.'s pew in St. Paul's, Richmond, on the Sunday of his hegira, began with the well-known line:

"Oh, where shall rest be found?"

Military.—The guns captured at Richmond—and left uninjured—are stated to be from 450 to 500, many of them of large calibre.

—— An application has been made to the War Department for permission to raise a regiment of men who have been held as prisoners of war. Young Major Higginson, commissioner from the Union prisoners at Andersonville, Ga., is mentioned as Colonel of it. He is the youngest officer of his rank in the army.

Art, Science and Literature.—We have heard of a process for producing artificial marble. Geologists tell us that one sort of real marble is nothing but chalk, through which an intensely-heated stream of carbonic acid has passed. The new process consists in heating powdered limestone and chalk in a porcelain vessel, from which atmospheric air is excluded. This seems simple enough; but whether it can be economically applied on the great scale, remains for further experiment. A method of coating wood with varnish as hard as stone has been recently introduced in Germany; the ingredients are 40 parts of chalk, 40 of resin, four of linseed oil, to be melted together in an iron pot. One part of native oxide of copper, and one of sulphuric acid, are then to be added, after which the composition is ready for use. It is applied hot to the wood with a brush, in the same way as paint, and, as before observed, becomes exceedingly hard on drying.

—— The suggestion that great economy would be effected if petroleum could be substituted for coal on board steamships, is likely to be brought into practice; Capt. Selwyn and Mr. C. J. Richardson have both given lectures on the use of mineral oils as steam-fuel at the the United Service Institution, London, where, of course, they were listened to by naval men able to judge of the merits of the question. To the objection, that petroleum has dangerous properties, the reply is, that the highly-inflammable spirit can be extracted, and leave the unexplosive oil only for burning.

—— The observation of Prof. Phillips, of Oxford, on the planet Mars, in 1862, have been renewed this year. The professor finds that in general features and main outlines of land and sea, Mars exhibits but little appreciable change. The color of the larger masses of land, he says, is the same as formerly observed, and the sea is grey and shadowy, but without the very distinct greenish hue which was noticed in 1862. The masses of snow at the poles were also clearly seen extending down to about 40 degrees of latitude, on which the professor remarks: "Assuming this to be the geographical limit of the freezing mean winter temperature, we see at once that it differs but little from that of the earth. If the snows on the land of Mars be compared with those on the northern tracts of Asia and America, they will be found not to extend further."

Foreign.—A writer in the London Times suggests that beneath the tarry pools of Zante, an island in the Mediterranean, from which Herodotus described the dipping out of the mineral oil with myrtle boughs, there is a rich source of petroleum to be developed the same as in America, where, upon the site of the oil wells from which such enormous wealth has been derived, the Indians formerly collected petroleum for medical purposes, as it gathered in scanty films upon stagnant water, by spreading their blankets upon the surface, little dreaming of the rich resources to be reached by boring. Large petroleum wells exist in Austria, and it is expected that the American improvements in the process of extraction will cause a great increase of the present quantity. Till now the most abundant wells have given about 15,000 cwt. yearly; the majority of them are in Galicia, and run parallel with the Carpathians.

—— Hitherto it has been a rule with the British and Spanish authorities in garrison at Gibraltar and the Spanish fortress on the opposite side of the strait to fire at any ship which might approach within cannon shot while sailing in those waters—a precaution which was rigorously observed, even when merchantmen were driven by the currents, or, in sheer ignorance, happened to commit a breach of this maritime etiquette. The British and Spanish Governments, considering that the original causes which made these regulations a military necessity have now passed away, and that a grave and acknowledged inconvenience may be obviated, have concluded a convention, which was signed on the 2d inst., whereby these regulations are abolished as regards vessels of the contracting countries.

—— A society has been formed in Stockholm, Sweden, under the name of the "Northern National Association," the object of which is to unite those citizens who consider it is of great importance to prepare by all legal means for the union of the three northern kingdoms into one federal constitutional State, with a common system of defence and a common direction of foreign affairs, while preserving the independence of each kingdom at home.

—— In the newly-discovered territory of North-Western Australia the baobab-tree grows to an enormous size. The diameter of one in the Camden Harbor region was nearly 50 feet, and, by the number of zones in some of the branches, was estimated to be 8,000 years old.

—— A New Zealand paper states that an egg of the gigantic extinct New Zealand bird moa has been dug up at Kaikoras, in the middle island, having been found buried with the skeleton of a Maori. The egg is 10 inches long, five in diameter, and of a dirty white color.

—— A Canadian journal states, on information which it has reason to believe is correct, that the number of Canadians who have enlisted in the United States army since the beginning of the war is 43,000. Of this number 35,000 were French Canadians, no less than 14,000 of whom have died on the battlefield.

—— A London paper states that in consequence of the probable occurrence during the summer of an event which will fill all loyal English subjects with joy, the Princess Alice of Hesse, or the Princess Helene, will hold drawing-rooms for her Majesty during the season, and thereby spare the fatigue to the Princess of Wales, who will only hold the next London "drawing-room."

—— While the Prince of Wales was witnessing the Chertsey steeplechases, his Royal Highness had his pocket picked of a valuable gold watch presented to him by the Queen. The police's solemn joke is that the thief will henceforth take the title of Pickpocket of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales.

—— Otho, the ex-king of Greece, is employing his leisure at Bamberry, where he is now residing, in writing a modern Greek Dictionary. We sincerely wish the author every success in his undertaking, as there is not a good or reliable dictionary of the modern Greek language in existence.

—— The widow of De Tocqueville died lately at the Chateau de Tocqueville, and was buried by her husband's side. She bequeathed her husband's papers to M. Beaumont, one of his friends, and his marble bust to the French Academy. Madame De Tocqueville was an English lady—Miss Mary Motley.

THE MURDER OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN.

THE illustrations we present to-day of the most appalling event in our history cannot fail to be gazed at reverently by a great nation, thus suddenly bereaved, in its most trying crisis, of a Chief Magistrate, whose characteristics eminently fitted him for the momentous task before him—the reconstruction of the Union. Those who say that the recent assassinations cannot proceed from Southern inspiration because they their have stricken down their two best friends, or rather most merciful opponents, but are the isolated deeds of fanatics, ignore, either ignorantly or wilfully, the whole scope and animus of the rebel leaders. Whenever have they shown either prudence, common sense or humanity? Indeed, these qualities have been altogether thrown aside, and a course diametrically opposite followed. Where was their common sense in starving 50,000 of our soldiers, when the fate of war had thrown them into their power, and when we had twice their number in our hands on whom to retaliate? Where was their common sense in breaking away merely because they had lost an election? These ought to sufficiently answer all who mask their sympathy for rebels-murderers, assassins and incendiaries, by throwing the flimsy veil of an affected philosophical doubt over the recent fiendish atrocities. It is part and parcel of a system which includes bloodhounds, banditti, midnight burnings, torpedoes, lingering tortures and all those exceptions to human nature which had been supposed to reside only in Chinese and Malay hearts, till they were found to be also in those of Southern slaveholders. The most probable theory is that these assassinations were part of a plot concocted by that portion of the rebel party, such as Davis, Breckinridge, Benjamin, Seddone, and those who are beyond the pale of amnesty, and whose malignant natures are roused against that part of their Southern brethren, who see the errors of their way and are willing to rejoin the Union. This blow, therefore, was intended by this devilish section of the rebellion to embitter the North against the South, in the feeble hope that the half penitent might be forced into a renewed though evidently fruitless resistance.

It is almost useless to recapitulate particulars which are now familiar to all. We shall, therefore, content ourselves with a brief description of the two pictures which it is our mournful duty to publish to-day, the murder of the President in his box at Ford's theatre, and of his death in the house of Mr. Petersen, nearly opposite the scene of the awful event. It appears that the President and his wife went to the theatre somewhat reluctantly, but he did so rather than disappoint the people, it having been announced that both himself and Gen. Grant were to be present. The departure of the latter for Philadelphia thus threw the onus upon the kind-hearted President, who, however firm he might be in matters of State, was known to be very yielding when only his own personal convenience was concerned.

From the most minute inquiries made on the spot by our Special Artist, Mr. Albert Berghaus, it seems that after a short interview with Mr. Ashman and Speaker Colfax, the President and Mrs. Lincoln entered their carriage, bade the gentlemen good-bye, and were driven to the residence of Senator Harris. Here they were joined by Miss Harris and Major Rathbun, of Albany, stepson of the Senator. On reaching the theatre the the party entered one of the upper private boxes, where they sat for an hour or more enjoying the performance, unconscious of danger. While the President sat looking towards the stage, laughing quietly at some droll episode in the play, a man abruptly entered the private box, and, placing a pistol close to his head, shot him. He also endeavored to strike the President with a dagger. The blow was received by Major Rathbun, who sprang forward to protect the President. The murderer then jumped upon the stage, where he exhibited his dagger, exclaiming, "Sic semper tyrannis!" "The South is avenged!" and then rapidly ran across to one of the side exits.

But one man in the audience (J. B. Stewart, Esq., a well-known lawyer) had sufficient presence of mind to jump upon the stage and follow the villain. Before this gentleman could force his way through the crowd of of actors (now terrified by the screams of Mrs. Lincoln and the confusion in the house), the murderer had left the building and, mounting a horse in the alleyway, fled. Miss Harris is confident that the same man who fired at the President came to the door of the box and looked in about an hour before the murder, but this circumstance was looked upon by the occupants as merely the pardonable curiosity of some one who wished to obtain a closer view of Mr. Lincoln.

Mrs. Lincoln remembers but little more than the sight of a man leaving the box, and at first supposed her husband had fallen upon the stage. She leaned over the balustrade a moment, and then looked towards the chair Mr. Lincoln occupied. She saw his head droop over upon his breast, and then, for the first time, discovered what had occurred.

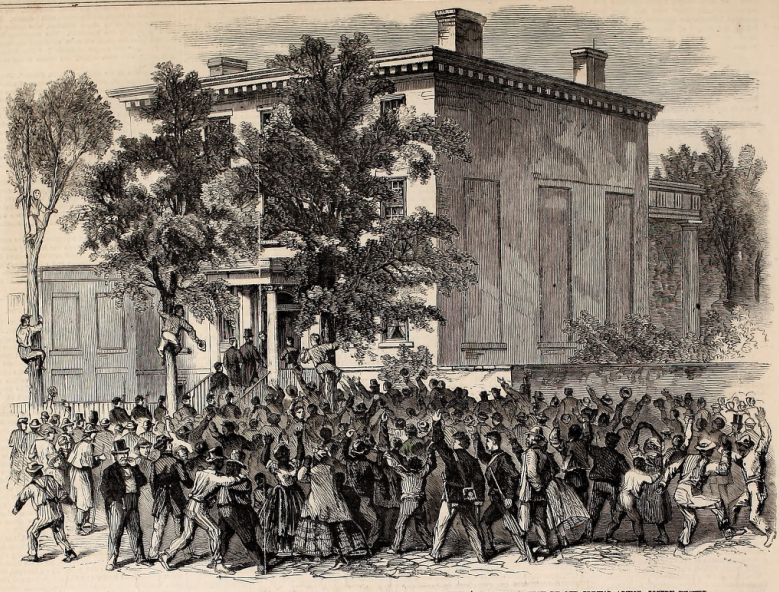
The scene of confusion that transpired is more easily imagined than described. A rush was made by most of the audience for the doors. Others crowded around the President. The Surgeon-General and other physicians were immediately summoned and every effort made to restore him to consciousness. An examination of his wounds so clearly indicated their fatal character that no hope could be given that his life would be spared.

The Deathbed of President Lincoln.

As soon as possible the dying President was removed to a house immediately opposite, occupied by Mr. Petersen. Here, in a back room, the head of a great nation breathed his last, surrounded by various members of his cabinet, and several others who were called thither by various duties. We have given an exact picture of this most momentous and melancholy event, the accuracy of which may be relied on—the very position of every spectator being carefully preserved. The room in which the President died is in the rear part of the building, and at the end of the main hall, from which rises a stairway. The walls are covered with a brownish paper, figured with a white design. Its dimensions are about ten by fifteen feet. Some engravings and a photograph hang upon the walls. The engravings were copies of the "Village Blacksmith," and Herring's "Stable and Barnyard Scenes." The photograph was one taken from an engraved copy of Rosa Bonheur's "Horse Fair." The only furniture in the room was a bureau covered with crochet, a table, eight or nine plain chairs, and the bed upon which Mr. Lincoln lay when his spirit took its flight. The headstead was a low walnut, with headboard from two to three feet high. The floor was carpeted with Brussels, considerably worn. Everything on the bed was stained with the blood of the Chief Magistrate of the nation.

Several surgeons were promptly summoned, but it was seen at once that the wound was mortal. When the President was carried out, the audience quickly dispersed, and blocked up the street in front of the theatre. A strong force of police was promptly on the spot, the street cleared, and mounted patrols posted at the corners. Rumors spread that several other prominent men had been assassinated, and the excitement grew into fury.

Through all the long, long night knots of men gathered in the streets and talked about the fearful event. Patrols galloped hither and thither at breakneck speed. Carriages rattled along the pavements and kept many eyes from closing in slumber. Crowds blocked Tenth street and F and E streets, discussing the painful news and asking questions of the guards, momentarily expecting to hear that the President was dead.



Inside the room the scene was beyond description. There, on the humble bed already described, lay the President, perfectly unconscious, the only evidence of life being an occasional nervous twitching of the hand and heavy breathing. At about half-past eleven the motion of the muscles of his face indicated as if he were trying to speak, but doubtless it was merely muscular. The blood from the wound in his neck interfered with his breathing, and his pulse was low. At four o'clock the symptom of restlessness returned, and at six the premonitions of dissolution set in. His face, which had been quite pale, began to assume a waxen transparency, the jaw slowly fell, and the teeth became exposed. Gradually and calmly, without a sigh or a groan, at twenty-two minutes past seven, April 15th, all that bound the soul of Abraham Lincoln was loosened, and the eventful career of one of the most remarkable men of our history was closed on earth. There were present at his death Senator Sumner, Capt. Robert Lincoln, Hon. S. Colfax, Dennison, Postmaster-General, Secretary of the Navy, Rufus Andrews, Mr. Petersen, proprietor of the house, and his son, Farnworth, the chief steward of the hospital, Henry and Julius Ulke, the artists, to whom our Artist, Mr. Berghaus, is indebted for much valuable assistance. There were also several others present, whose names are duly inscribed in the caption of the picture representing this wonderful event.

We think it right to name here that Mr. Petersen's house, in which the President died, is one of the most respectable houses in Washington, and not a tenement house, as stated by some papers.

Our Artist, Mr. Berghaus, begs to express to Captain J. W. M. Camly and Sergeant-Major Senix his acknowledgments for many civilities and valuable facilities in making his sketches and inquiries. He also wishes us to state that the house in which the President died is one of the highest of its class in Washington.

JOHN WILKES BOOTH.

THIS unhappy wretch, whose mad and wicked hand has struck down the foremost man in all the realm, is the youngest son of the famous actor, Junius Brutus Booth, and brother to the hardly less celebrated Edwin Booth, whose Hamlet is familiar to all. He was born in Maryland some thirty years ago, and received a good education, being his father's favorite son. He finally adopted the stage as a profession, and recently performed in New York the part of Marc Antony, in Julius Cæsar, the characters of Brutus and Cassius being assumed by his brothers Edwin and Lucius Junius. He recently entered into oil speculations, and is reported to have made a considerable fortune. For some time past he has been living on a farm on the Potomac, occasionally visiting New York and Washington. The evidence hitherto gathered leaves no doubt that his well-known Secession opinions have pointed him out to the Southern rebels as a fit agent for the performance of their murderous design.

PRESIDENT LINCOLN VISITING THE LATE RESIDENCE OF JEFFERSON DAVIS IN RICHMOND, VA., APRIL 4.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, JOSEPH BECKER.

ABOUT ART.

ALL written language was originally pictorial; the representation of a man was emblematical of reason and intellect; of a lion, strength and courage; of a horse, swiftness; a fox, cunning and deceit; a sheep, timidity; and so on, according to the well-known attributes of animals. And pictures, or carvings of inanimate objects, often seen on Egyptian monuments, although less intelligible to the lower orders of the masonic priesthood, were doubtless perfectly well-known to the higher ranks of this mysterious fraternity.

RELIGION has always been the corner-stone of the great fabric of civilization; and as the ancients used costly and colossal sculpture to excite reverence for the gods so the Roman Catholic priests have employed the painted altar-piece to inspire religious devotion. The colossal grandeur of the granite idols of Egypt was well calculated to awe the superstitious multitude; and the exquisite and unrivalled beauty of Greek art to fascinate that refined and fastidious people, so sensitive to external impressions from architecture, painting and sculpture. The extraordinary statues which Mr. Layard has brought from Nineveh are remarkably illustrative of the powerful language of sculpture. These huge monsters are the expression of abstract ideas. The winged, human-headed lion, or bull, represents the intelligence of man combined with the strength of the brute and the flight of the eagle. All these figures are typical of moral as well as physical qualities. The Griffon of the Greeks is of Oriental origin. Centaurs, fauns, and satyrs, however repugnant to our taste, had a silent signification. The centaur evidently represents the combined strength and power of the man and the horse; a satyr is an intelligent goat, and the graceful faun seems to represent a somewhat paradoxical expression of an elegant and accomplished savage, for he could dance, sing, and play on the flute; his pointed ears and tiny tail are the only remaining marks of his quadrupedal origin; he is in the last stage but one of the perfection of our animal nature.

THE SOLDIER, FROM HIS WIFE.

My very dear husband,
I've so much to say,
So much has occurred since you've been away,
Such changes have happened, without and within,
That to tell you them all I can scarcely begin.

I suppose 'twill be best to commence at the start,
To commence at that hour when with aching heart,
As I handed the drums beat your funeral knell,
I prayed God preserve you, and bade you farewell.

I looked after you all, bravely marching away,
'Mid the sunlight and music that sorrowful day;
I cried to be brave, too, and smothered my fears,
And watched you as long as I could through my tears.

Then, fearing lest Johnny or Susie might roam,
I took each little hand and wandered off home.
Our home! My dear husband, you know, and you only,
How dearly I love it! But all was so lonely,
So deserted and dreary did everything seem,
That I fancied my happiness there but a dream.
I could almost have fancied we lived there no more,
Had not Bridget and baby just come to the door.
Inside, 'twas the same; the house seemed bereft
Of all its attractions, now you, dear, had left.
In all of the rooms, there would still mock my view
Some object reminding me sadly of you.
Your hat, on the nail by the kitchen door;
Your coat, careless boy! on the bedroom floor;
And 'twas thus everywhere; I had thought myself stronger,
But now you were gone, I could bear up no longer;
So I sat myself down, and, when no one was by,
Indulged my full heart with a real good cry.
You will say that I kept my promises ill;
And perhaps you will scold me for being so silly;
But my cry did me good; so scold if you choose.
Well now I suppose I must tell you the news.

And first, of course, you will want to know
Of the children, how they flourish and grow.
The dear little things! how much you must miss them,
And long for the time when you once more can kiss them!
They will not forgot you, while you are away,
For they chatter about you the live-long day.
And I chatter with them, as earnest as they,
"And almost as childish," I hear you say.
Johnny plays he's a soldier and marches about,
With his drum and his gun, both in-doors and out;
And close at his heels follows poor little Sue,
Who thinks that all he does she also must do.
So Johnny is Captain, as grand as can be,
And Susie, he says, is "Company C."
John is growing to be such a mischievous wight,
I'm in terror, whenever he's out of my sight;

But then he's so manly, and kind-hearted, too,
And gets me in mind, dear, so often of you,
That I fear I shall spoil him, in spite of myself,
For I can't bear to punish the dear little elf.
Our Sue is a jewel; so rosy and fat;
She's the best child in town, I am certain of that.
My opinion, I know, you will not dispute,
For you always did think her remarkably cute.
The baby grows finely; is getting so knowing;
But so hard to take care of, most always be going.
And oh!—I must tell you—I showed her this morning
My picture of you, when without any warning,
She looked in my face with her pretty blue eyes,
"'Tis papa!" she cried, to my pleasant surprise.
And then at the sound of her own voice affrighted,
She nestled close to me. I was so delighted;
And oh! how I wished that you could be near her!

O my love! I shall miss you so much every day
How sad it does seem that you must be away!
They may talk as they please, in poem and
Of patriotism, and fighting, and glory,
And the honor it is for our flag to have fought,
But I cannot appreciate it, half as I ought.

THE ORPHAN'S NEW HOME.

Now don't scold me, and call me a rebel. You know
I do love my land, for I let you go;
And suppose you should never come back! But there!
If I dared think of that, I should die of despair.
Oh, if I were the President just for a day,
And the nation allowed me to have my own way,
One day would suffice, I should ask for no more,
I would soon put an end to this horrible war.
Don't ask what I'd do; I won't tell, that's decided;
My feminine politics shan't be decided;
For you, wicked man, would be sure to laugh,
At the deeply-planned scheme of your better-half.
I must stop writing now, for the baby is crying;
But my thoughts, to you, dearest, are evermore flying.
With kisses from John, Sue, and dear little Fanny
Good-bye! and write soon to
Your loving wife,
ANNIE.

LOVEMAKING AND ECCLESIASTICISM.

For I know you will now be so anxious to hear her.
She has said it a great many times since then,
And I make her repeat it, again and again.
Yo know she already is trying to walk,
And before you come back I suppose she will talk.

BESSIE'S FORTUNES.

BY MIRIAM WARE.

CHAPTER I.

From the high hotel coach that stands before the carved marble steps of Levering Place descends a quaint, grim little figure in black. It trips up the white flight of steps, and stands at the doorway, watching with evident concern the careless swing with which the driver lowers from the roof of the coach a little worn black bonnet-

box. Then the child—for the little quaint figure represents ten years of a womanly childhood—looks out over the lawn, and the beautiful flowers spread out before her, and a soft expression of pleasure gradually brightens her sad face, but recalling herself, she turns to the entrance.

"The doors are fastened!" she calls in a soft, musical voice to the driver, who has just gathered up the reins to depart.

"Pull the bell handle, little lass, and God help you among the grand folks!" he replied, and with a flourish of the whip wheeled the leaders and was some distance down the drive ere the little one timidly drew the bell handle, and then stood with the little worn bonnet-box at her feet, looking out over the garden and down through the trees of the lawn, seeing but little of the beautiful prospect beyond, only standing looking out with a vague weariness, dreamily oblivious of past and present, a little waif skirting the shore of the future, friendless, homeless and unknown, yet dreaming on the threshold of her destiny in the bright spring morning. She hears a slight noise, and turning sees that the doors have swung open, and a solemn, careworn servant man stands within, patiently awaiting her demands.

"I would like to see Mrs. Levering," the child says.

"Will you walk in?" the man replies.

"Please take charge of my little trunk," and mounting one more step she treads quickly along the tesselated echoing hall, showing her into a small elegantly furnished room, the man disappeared. Feeling the soft velvet carpet under her feet as she advances into the room, unconsciously she tiptoes over its yielding meshes to a little seat in a corner, from which she looks over and around the room with dilated, startled eyes; all is so new, so new to the little one. She half starts from her seat as she hears a door close suddenly and loudly in a distant part of the house, and then all is quiet. The silence becomes almost painful to the child in her anxious expectancy, and she closes her eyes with a deep sigh, while her hands work nervously together. Again she half starts as she hears footsteps descending the staircase:

"Mrs. Levering wishes you to come up to her room."

She is on her feet in a moment, then, controlling the sudden impulse, proceeds more quietly up the broad staircase after the servant, saying as she goes:

"You will please look after my little trunk?" and as the dark eyes imploringly meet his, he softens, saying kindly, "Oh, yes; I will look after it."

The door is opened by a trim mulatto maid, with a little white cap, decorated with purple ribbons perched on her crisp hair. She bows her head, biting her lip with an ill suppressed smile, as the little figure in black stands in the doorway.

"Come to me, child," the lady says, and the little one quietly goes, gazing into her face with a yearning, wistful look. The lady takes the little hand, and kisses the soft cheek.

"How did you come, Bessie?"

"Mr. Colton, the clerk of the drug store over which we lived, brought me to K——, and then sent me out in the hotel carriage. I have all of my clothes with me in my little trunk down stairs," she said, with a practical old womanish air.

A young lady who sat at some little distance, toying with the cover of a book that lay closed in her lap, and who had seemed much amused during the interview, now held her fan before her face to conceal the smile that played over it, as the child finished and stood looking earnestly in the face of the lady. And truly the trim little figure, robed in a short black dress, with a round cape reaching nearly to the skirt, a queer little old-fashioned crape bonnet, with bows and ends of sombre crape for face trimmings, would not have been a prepossessing one, had it not been for the sweet face that looked forth from its dismal surroundings—looked forth with a high and noble soul shining truthfully from the dark eyes. There was a calm patience, too, expressed in the firm small mouth, as she waited to be disposed of. Evidently Mrs. Levering's heart softened more and more towards the child, for she said:

"I am glad you are here, Bessie; consider this your home, and remember that I am glad that in you I have a little companion. Now Nannie will take you to your room; come to me whenever you wish, I will always be glad to have you with me."

The child's eyes for a moment had rested on the floor, now in turning as she raised them to the lady's face they were full of tears.

"The poor little motherless thing," the lady said as the door closed after the child.

"Aunt, I laughed behind my fan until the tears were in my eyes. Why she is the most singular little body I ever saw; to think of her bringing her clothes so carefully in her little trunk, and to think what quaint old-fashioned clothes they are!" and Bella Hunt laughed again heartily. "You told me she was a relative, is she a near relative, aunt?"

"Her mother was the child of my husband's sister—a bright young beauty who married an officer in the army when only sixteen; this child was three years old when he died, leaving beside her nothing that could be called his own. You cannot but feel a sympathy for the child, when I read you the letter the dying mother wrote me—her only remaining connection. The man who wrote of her death, and answered my letter telling Bessie to come to me, for a time at least, told of her labor and endurance, until mind and body were completely prostrated. I was sorry indeed to hear of her trials, but why will girls make such misalliances, and spend a portion of their life in wearing out body and soul in making a bare subsistence for themselves and children? I put the letter in my desk—Nannie, give it to me. Now, Bella, listen to the poor dead woman's letter:

'Aunt Bella—I am dying! The physicians tell me that this week will be my last in this world, where I have struggled ceaselessly, and almost uselessly, since my noble husband died. I write to tell you this, not to excite your compassion for me, for before your eyes look upon the words I form with so much pain my heart will be at rest, through Christ's grace I trust my soul will be at peace. But I write, O aunt Bella! whatever our family differences may have been, you are a mother, and the blood of your husband's family flows only in the veins of this child besides your son's. So I write to tell you that this child, this precious little one, for whom I have struggled and fought through life's hardest battles, will be friendless, will be an orphan, aunt, and friendless. Pity me! O pity me! but more than all, pity this child of ten years, to whom the world seems so beautiful, yet, in reality, to whom it is so cheerless! I have been able to sustain my child by my personal labor, but now that death separates us, I appeal to you in her behalf, my little Bessie, may she come to you when my weary body has found peace? Let her come at least until her father's friends can hear of her, and perhaps claim her. O, receive her until God in his Providence shall raise her up friends. After I am laid away your letter will find her at the house of a friend who has been kind to us, Mr. Colton, of Hunteville. And now, aunt, I write to you, knowing that the impulses of your heart were always kind, that a tender benevolence drew you always to little children. With pained-drawn lips, I beseech you let her rest for a space in your house, and the prayers of a world-weary, heart-broken mother will follow you.

Hunteville, March —, ——. Edith Lynn.

"Poor creature! Oh, aunt, that is very distressing; what will you do?"

"I was quite undecided until to-day; now that I have seen the child I have decided to keep her, poor little penniless thing. She will be a companion for me while you are travelling during different portions of the year. No; I am resolved to have nothing to do with the Lynn relatives. No doubt they have known all this time of Edith's destitution, I knew nothing of it until the poor girl's letter reached me."

"What does she mean by a family difference, auntie?"

"Why, my husband's brother and Edith Lynn's father, Richard Levering, claimed a large tract of land with this home place, as his portion, by a will that he asserted his mother had made a few days before her death, though it was not produced when he strove by law to establish his claim. When summoned to court, Colonel Levering was justly incensed at the rapacity of his brother—for his father's will had divided the property equally between the two—urging the mother at her death to give the home place to the eldest son, in lieu of which he gave to the younger a large sum of money. When this suit was brought into court, Richard Levering had already spent a fortune in extravagant purchases; for instance, when travelling in Europe he bought statues and pictures without number, making a very beautiful yet exceedingly expensive selection. He had also a passion for purchasing elegant bijouterie and diamonds, and presenting them to his friends, who received without returning his favors. Of course he became greatly embarrassed and much in debt. Then he brought forward this suit, producing as witnesses a country lawyer and two servant men. The lawyer pretended to have written the will while we were in Europe, and Colonel Levering's mother was staying with his brother Richard, though the will had not been produced when Richard Levering died. Captain Lynn, his daughter's husband, put a stop to the suit, and carried his wife with him to California, where he was stationed. I did not even know that she had returned to Huntsville, where her father was once a man of wealth. Do you know that this little Bessie interests me very much? She is pretty—do you not think so? Her face is very expressive."

"I have no doubt that she would be a lovely child out of the weird crape knots and ends that so surround her little face. What a demure puss she seemed, with her black bag on her arm. I wonder what she carried?"

Up into the third story the weary little feet climbed, and the dim eyes were still filled with those lonely bitter tears, called forth by the sound of a kind voice. The door closed and she was alone. The little worn black bonnet-box stood near the bed. Throwing herself on her knees beside it, and resting her head on her arm, she cried and wailed pitifully:

"Mama, oh, my dear, dead mama! I am all alone."

The room is low yet pleasant, with pretty cottage furniture, bright carpet, and little pictures of peaceful country scenes; further on there opened a small round room in the tower, containing a little bookcase filled with childish books, a wash-stand, and more of the pleasant country pictures, with also, over a little desk, a picture of the Virgin with her Child clasped to her heart, looking upward with a pure and holy serenity in her face. When the childish grief had subsided, the quaint bonnet thrown aside, the clustering hair brushed back from the delicately veined temples, the little figure then took a survey of its surroundings. She stood at the window, which opened almost to the floor, and clasped her hands impulsively, with a pleased exclamation, as she saw the fresh and beautiful landscape stretching far away for miles; the broad river in the distance, like a lake, lay between the green hills that partially surrounded it.

"It is beautiful," the child murmured; "but where is my mama? She told me to say my little verse when lonely."

So she clasped her small hands, saying, with closed eyes:

"When my father and mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up."

She turned and looked at the picture, looking above all at the saintly and beautiful face of the Mother of Christ.

"Now I am the Lord's; where will He send me when Mrs. Levering can keep me no longer?"

She thought of this a moment, and then, taking her little bag, drew out a half-finished stocking and knit industriously until dinner was announced.

CHAPTER II.

Levering Place to-night is all aglow. Softly through the richly curtained windows shines the light, and down the lawn shine crimson and amber beams from myriads of swinging lanterns. All is joy and brightness, for the long absent son has returned. Music and laughter float around the rooms and up to the third story, where a little figure in a black dress leans over the carved balustrade in pleased wonder and childish curiosity.

"I heard Miss Bella say Earl. I wonder if it is Mrs. Levering's son?" the child whispers. "I wonder if he will have her soft, kind voice? Oh, there he comes! How tall he is! Ah, yes, he is good; for he puts his arm around her and kisses her again on the landing. I will go now, as Mrs. Levering told me, for I can go down with her. How I dread meeting all of those people!"

So the child turned the key of her door, for it was one of her quaint habits to keep a strict watch and ward upon her scanty possessions, and then slowly descended the stairs, had reached the hall, and was proceeding to her aunt's room, when a door opened near her, and the same tall gentleman with whom she had seen Mrs. Levering came out. He would have passed her without notice, when he caught sight of the dark, earnest eyes that curiously scrutinised him.

"What is your name, little one?" he then said, taking her hand.

"Bessie Lynn, sir."

"Do you live in K——?"

"No, sir; Mrs. Levering told me that this was my home."

"Ah! What did you tell me your name was?"

"Bessie Lynn, sir."

"And this is your home? Then I'll see you often, little Bessie," and he passed on down the stairs.

"Bessie, my child, you have come late," Mrs. Levering said. "Let me tie this ribbon for you, and then you will go down with me. Do you know, Bessie, that my dear son has come?" she said, joyfully. "He lingered so long that I feared he would not even reach home to-night. Now come."

Bella Hunt was at the piano as, with Bessie's hand in hers, Mrs. Levering entered the music-room. There were many gentlemen standing around the instrument, and the child remembered one tall form among them as the one she had met in the hall. She knew him before Mrs. Levering whispered:

"The tallest gentleman near Bella is my son. Sit here, child, and listen to the music; I must go in the other room."

She did listen with pleasure, for Bella Hunt's voice, though low, was sweet and richly cultivated. Two ladies beside her were discussing the musician:

"She is quite pretty," came to Bessie's ears. "Is she not engaged, or expected to be, to Earl Levering?"

"Dame Rumor assigns her to him, how truly I know not."

Supper being announced, Bella passed out with her hand on Earl's arm. Other couples followed, and then little Bessie sat alone. She trembled at the idea of going into the supper-room, amid all that throng of strangers, and so she sat in the brilliant light, with the hum of voices and laughter floating in to her from the distant supper-room; she sat and tried to sing in her mind the song Miss Bella had just sung. She looked at the pictures on the walls and the statuary in the niches, then the gilding waved in ripples before her eyes, and the stately tragic statues flitted before her, and then grew dimmer and more dim; the little head, with its wavy, rings of jetty hair, fell back against the high-cushioned chair, and dreamlessly Bessie slept, unconscious alike of light, joy and laughter. Earl Levering came to the door in search of a servant, he stept forward when he saw the white placid face with its surroundings of black, looked a moment with an artist's eye at the sleeping grace of the figure, then, stooping, took her tenderly up in his arms and carried her to his mother's room. Laying her on a couch, he returned to the supper-room before his absence was known.

Weeks and months passed on and the child became more and more beloved by all in the house. Her quaint little womanly ways, her attention and care for all about her, and, above all, the timid refinement that marked every word and action, made her to each member of the family a delightful study. She was particularly affectionate and winsome to Mrs. Levering. Every morning she brought flowers and arranged them in the vases in her room with her own tiny hands, and hour after hour she would read unweariedly aloud from the lady's favorite authors; and then, when not otherwise engaged, she industriously knit, as her mother had learned her, on the little stockings for her own use.

"Mrs. Levering," she said, one day, "before my mama died she gave me two little parcels; one she told me always to keep in my little trunk, and to be very careful always to lock my door or trunk when I left my room, for the papers were my papa's letters to her. The other parcel mama told me to give to some good kind lady to keep for me until I was fifteen, when I must open it and look at a story she had written. Will you keep the little parcel for me, Mrs. Levering?"

"Certainly, my child. I will keep it in a little box, where I have some letters I prize; I will lock it safely in until my little child woman becomes fifteen. I want you, Bessie, to take music lessons. Monsieur Pinero will come this morning and give you your first lesson. I am anxious that you should execute with much grace and sing with taste. Do not disappoint me."

The child needed no other incentive, and practised sedulously day after day. Earl Levering was also interested in the child's pretty womanly ways. One morning, when he found her reading to his mother, he asked her if she would read some books that he had for her, the child joyfully said "Yes." And then he marked out a course of reading, and showed her where she could find each book among the books in the library. He was showing his mother, one day, some little paintings of views he had admired in Switzerland, when Bessie came to his side, saying, timidly:

"Would you please show me once or twice, and then I think I could paint; for I do so love pictures."

"Indeed I will, little one, with pleasure; and I shall make a great painter of you one day."

Then a little canvas was kept in the small tower room, and the child worked perseveringly at minute little pictures, until it was covered. She lost not a moment, in her eagerness to excel, and her great fondness for art. One hour every morning, in his mother's boudoir, Earl Levering patiently instructed the child, and he boasted continually of his pupil, while Mrs. Levering sat silently by, wondering at the proficiency of the child, and wondering, more than all, as she marked her beautiful eyes and thoughtful face, what her future would be? During this time Miss Bella was entertaining a host of lovers, or visiting her numerous friends in K——

Bessie was quietly reading to her aunt one morning, when a servant brought in a card, with the message that a gentleman in the parlor wished to see Miss Bessie Lynn. The child's eyes dilated with surprise when she read, "Major Willis Lynn, U. S. A." And she urged Mrs. Levering so vehemently to go down with her, that the lady at last consented. The visitor arose, expressed his pleasure in meeting Mrs. Levering, and, stooping down, kissed Bessie, calling her his little niece.

"I hope, Major Lynn, that you have not come to rob me of my little comfort, my Bessie?" Mrs. Levering said, after mutual inquiries had been made.

"Far from it, my dear madam. I have come prompted only by affection for my dead brother. I was stationed in New Mexico at the time of his death, and could not obtain a furlough to go to his bereaved widow. Knowing that she had sought her friends in the States, I wrote to her once or twice, and as the letters were never answered, I believed she had found new ties and cared not to write."

"My mother loved my father with all her heart to the day of her death," spoke up Bessie, with a very red face.

Mrs. Levering softly stroked the child's head, as she said:

"We all have reason to regret that the last days of Edith's life, at least, were not brightened by some one of her relatives, but our regrets are, alas! too late!"

And then Mrs. Levering skilfully changed the subject, but the tears filled Bessie's eyes at the memory of that lonely dying bed. She cheered up afterwards when her uncle talked to her in a gentle, affectionate tone.

They were sitting in the little music-room, in which Bessie had been ushered by the solemn servant on the first day of her arrival, when Bella came in from her walk, singing, in her low, sweet voice, "Auld Robin Gray." As she entered the room Major Lynn started forward, and then paused, while his lips grew tremulous and white.

"Is it possible! Major Lynn, how glad I am to see you," exclaimed coquettish Miss Bella. "When did you leave Washington?" Yet a rich, bright color spread over her face in spite of herself.

"I left two weeks ago, and little expected, Miss Hunt, to see you so soon at home. You have been quite well, I hope?"

"Quite well, and you are? Ah! you are a relative of Bessie's, Major Lynn? the similarity of names never struck me before," and then Miss Bella chatted away about friends in Washington, and made inquiries in regard to army officers whom she had met there, until dinner was announced, and the major arose to take his leave. Mrs. Levering urged him to dine with them, and after a short indecision he remained; indeed I must add that like many army officers on furlough, with ample time upon their hands, the gallant major remained through the afternoon, petting Bessie with quiet caresses, and many tender words. Miss Bella sang and played for him, and conversed with more vivacity than Bessie ever remembered to have heard her before in society.

After he had gone Bessie walked wearily up to her room, and stood looking out upon the smiling prospect; the yellow rays of the evening sun glinted the tree tops, and far down the broad river lay in a golden indistinct mist. He was her papa's brother, and he had not even asked her to go home with him; what was her life? what aim had she throughout the future? would it always be thus? One of dependence upon these kind friends.

"Why not," she queried; "they are generous and seem to love me. What claim have I upon them that I should be thus content from day to day?"

Spiritless girl! and she wheeled away from the window, seized the paint brush, and worked rapidly.

CHAPTER III.

Earl Levering was in the studio, a small room opening from the library where he kept his choicest pictures. Four years have passed, yet his face is the same; noble and self-reliant. This morning he is active, and busy directing a servant in hanging some pictures, that have just arrived; and as Bessie entered the library, for a book, he called her to come and look at his new acquisitions. One was a copy of Correggio's "Education of Cupid," taken from a copy of the original, which once belonged to Murat at Naples. Mr. Levering had ordered it in Paris; another a copy of Murillo's "Jesus and St. John." Bessie looked at it long, but she was charmed by a small "St. Cecilia," of Raffaelle's. Earl pointed out to her the difference in drapery, shading and expression for which each artist had gained a celebrity. She made a quick resolve;

"I so much admire that head of St. Cecilia, may I come often to look at it?"

"As often, as you please; you see, Bessie, ma petite, how imperishable is love. The beautiful face of St. Cecilia has come down to us inspired by Raphaël's affection for a beautiful woman, called La Fornarina."

"I have read of it," the young girl said, dryly.

"Of course, ma belle, what is it that you have not read, in history, biography, metaphysics, and even theology; don't you feel strong enough to hold an argument with some stout high church man?"

Bessie laughed, and left the room with her books, but rapidly each day she learned her resolve into execution, copying with minute precision the head of the St. Cecilia.

"Bessie, my dear," Mrs. Levering said one morning when the young girl sat down to read to her, as was her usual custom, "my head pains me so badly that if you will sit by me, and hold my hand, and talk to me, you will oblige me more than by reading; talk to me about your mother and father: do you remember your father?"

"I have only an indistinct remembrance of papa?"

"Did he look like your uncle, Major Lynn?"

"Something like him, I think."

"I was surprised to find that he knew Belle so well; it seems that he met her in society at Washington. Ah! me, I am afraid that Belle's fondness for society grows more and more upon her."

"What is that there, mama? Some trouble of Belle's which you sigh over?" said Earl Levering, just in from his drill.

"A trouble that almost overclouds the joy to which I have so looked forward; the pleasure of a nearer bond in our family circle."

"Ah! ma mère, 'Man proposes but God disposes.'"

"My darling wish should not be a matter of so much indifference; you, Earl, have taken no steps towards it, as yet?"

"And God helping me, mother, I never will take a step towards it. When I marry I must insure my happiness by loving my wife with a tender devotion, not with a brotherly affection. In my right arm must our fortune be found, should need be, but in the silent love for her of my wife. Give me a kiss, and let me read Schiller while you compose your aching head to sleep."

Bessie felt the head tremble that lay in her own, but the mother's eyes closed, and all was silent; the rich melody was broken.

Upon the century's verge, oh man, how fair
Thou standest, stately as a silent palm,
With leaf-fan-spreading through the solemn air,
To thy full growth of millenvet years sublime:
Each summer-season, through the ages past,
Each season unchilled, all the soul matured—
She crowned thee with a fresher, richer crest.

Soon the grasp upon the young girl's hand grew less rigid, the breath came even and more calm, and the lady rested only for an opportunity to glide from the room.

When he saw his mother sleeping, and the girl's soul vacant, Earl Levering laid aside his book, and stood by the window in deep thought.

In the little tower room the light shines out night after night for half twelve o'clock, and then and past, and a young artist, with persevering energy, toils on and on. She has received a new incentive, and busies herself night and day. She has finished the head of St. Cecilia after a long pause on the world. The man who befriended her mother in her last sickness, who has learned, is almost in a state of destitution from expensive and long sickness, brought upon him, so the solemn servant, who is an ally of hers, takes the picture of the St. Cecilia—under a promise of secrecy—to a picture dealer, who is glad to sell all of her productions. The unlucky servant with the muffled picture stumbles on Earl Levering, and in his forgetfulness of loyalty, whence, and where it came from, with dolorous sympathetic exclamations, throughout the story of the sick man. Earl Levering bought the picture, and Bessie, pauvre petite, unwittingly receives the money; at the same time Mr. Gibbs receives also a check for five hundred dollars, from an unknown friend, which friend Earl Levering knows intimately, and is himself.

"Bessie, my child, I want you to take a gallop with me this evening; we will go down to the river and see the fishing party pass; that will leave K——— at four o'clock, if you can get so much hurried with your painting," he said, quizzingly looking at her. A reply soon passed up Bessie's face, but she made no reply, save:

"I would like to ride."

Every pulse in the young girl's face looked in its hat with drooping plumes, and the long black habit enveloped the tall, graceful form, without losing from its elegant ease of motion. Verily Bessie had studied in a hard school, but she had learned her lessons of the more thoroughly, and cultivated every power, until the earnestness of one who realises that her only possession lies within her mind. Heaven had given her child a face of magnificent beauty; a mind of depth and scope; and a soul of high spirit, and purposes with noble impulses, and this light burning clear for he had studied this child day by day, and with the foil of worldly and ambitious surroundings; he saw how pure and disinterested her life was, and reverenced and loved her with the might of his strong heart.

"Bessie," he said, when the ride had come time in silence, "I discovered the secret of your Cecilia yesterday. Why will you do so? I know what you work night and day. Why is this, Bessie? Can you not come to me for what you want?"

"Perhaps I am working out the American theory, that 'upon the laborer descends happiness,'" she answered lightly.

"Are you answering my questions, little one? Why all these letters from publishers, and this constant pounding."

"Mr. Levering, I long to entitle myself to a home by my own exertions," Bessie answered, earnestly.

"What exertions will give you this title?"

"The exertion of power, that I possess; for instance, perseverance and energy."

"Oh, child! answer one question, would you rest and be happy in a home procured by your own exertions?"

"I would, indeed."

"Bessie, exert yourself to love me, for I so long for your affection, my whole soul and life turns to you with a devoted love, and, oh, child, in your home find a title to rest and happiness."

The child's face grew very pale, as Earl Levering grasped her bridle, rein, the rider side, saying, "Bessie, answer me as your truthful nature bids you, for I have waited for this time since the earliest dawn of your girlhood."

"Mr. Levering, I will answer you truthfully. Your affection has, long before I became a woman, wearied child, I presented myself before her homeless, and I should have been friendless had it not been for her kindness. So strange much that you should marry your cousin Belle; do not disappoint her—brave all do not make me the cause of her unhappiness, for I have a soul so tender."

"Bessie, does this come from you, too, my little mysteriously being? You cannot comprehend how much pain and suffering would make me. I do love you, Bessie. If you refuse me every other answer, but one only do you love me?"

"I cannot even tell you that, until you have told your mother."

"Bessie, little child, how old do you think I am? Bessie, little woman, I am going to dash my horse right into that river, and not come back until you take a more decisive mood, or I will take as an affirmative answer. Now, if you'd rather I'd drown, keep perfectly quiet."

And the horse's nose was dashed his horse into the water, followed by a frightened shriek from Bessie, which brought him around, and galloping up to the steps gave the hand that held her bridle, and told her that he considered her engaged to him so she had answered affirmatively, and he meant to keep her so. Bessie sprang to the earth triumphant, smiling wry at her blushing face and downcast eyes; this regal manner at last brought forth a smile from the young girl, and then she did love him some, she would not tell him how much; and that they were very silly for talking short it was the first time she ever gave a mistaken idea; she felt doubly ill at ease when she heard that lady say to Belle, who was playing with a kitten, her fair hair hanging loosely over her shoulders, and her figure thrown carelessly upon an ottoman in the blue library, "Belle, you have a history of youthful attitudes and expressions, frequently not forgetting the pouts, of a spoiled child.

"Dolly, that baby and, 'why is it that you go not so seldom with Earl? I have not seen you either walking or riding with him for weeks."

"Mamma, mamma, you will see that you not been asked, and many weeks will yet pass before I shall invite him to take me. Yesterday, at your request mamma, I dressed for the party, but the next lover I vow I will marry. I am no longer either a baby or a schoolgirl."

"Dolly, that baby and she flourished, with the kitten, out of the room.

"Bessie, my dear girl, will you do me a favor? the lady continued, as the door closed, in an imperative necessity that Earl Levering should marry Belle Hunt. I feel now that his hold upon the affections of Face and Fortune, and therefore the lawyer who prosecuted a suit against Earl's father, in which the production of a will made by Earl Levering's father was all important, and at that time was believed not to exist—this lawyer came to Earl and proposed for a certain pecuniary consideration, to give up the will, and destroy it, and this he did, and now he is interest in the will shortly before he died. If this be true, without the income from his large landed estate, Earl Levering would be a poor man. Bella and Earl have lived together for years, and are fond of each other. Earl claims the romance of devotion to me, and I believe it, and, Bessie, so long for me, Bessie; tell him how much like my own child Bella is already; he will listen to you, for he admires and reverences your independent noble character. You will do this for me, child, will you not?"

"I will," the young girl said, with a pale face, as she left the room.

"Can it be possible that she is interested in Earl?" Mrs. Levering thought.

Earl Levering sat in the library busily writing, at the table full of accounts, memorandas and deeds. Looking up as the door opened, he was struck by the white calm of Bessie's face and the dilation of the dark eyes.

"May I speak to you a moment?" the girl said.

"Of course you can, ma belle; I've been sighing for that music."

"Do not jest—you must grant me one favor."

"A thousand petits, speak. No! pardon me, I will not promise. What have you to say, Bessie?"

"You must promise me that you will love, that you will marry Bella Hunt; your interests are concerned, your property, and above all your mother's pride and happiness."

He suddenly pushed his papers away and looked across the table, up into her face as she stood.

"Who has been telling you this, Bessie? Who has been talking to you? Now let them dare! They know me! and I shall claim you as my bride in the face of them both. Come to me, Bessie, do not look so pale!"

"Mr. Levering, your mother has been my mother—"

"Pounds, she shall be your mother in truth!"

"She has been one of the kindest and truest of friends to me. I should not give her sorrow in return for this love. Do and say what you will, I shall not be your wife. The world is wide, and, thanks to God, to her and to you, I am strong and self-sustained; let this end our conversation."

"Bessie!" he exclaimed, in fierce anger. The door closed, and he was alone. Into the third story room, and the door was locked—in where the steel and unfinished pictures were, where the open desk was covered with the loose, closely written sheets, and where, under the picture of the Madonna, stood the little worn black trunk stood—down on the floor the child sank. "Oh, mamma! mamma! you, too, were bereaved! yet you, too, were strong to the end!" With sobs and tears she taken out the worn package of letters, opens and reads.

Then she rises, and striding up and down his mother's rooms.

"I will start off the child to seek me tamely to marry Miss Killmansegge! because, forsooth, of her 'golden leg.' I have no patience with all this plaster, as I call it, of one's sense, and knew as well as the best of you who I wanted for a wife."

"Earl, your sister."

"That may be relative!"

The door opened, and Bessie's white face appeared. Calmly and deliberately she walked to the fireplace, and threw the whole of Miss Hunt's letter, both Levering, who, in possession of all her faculties and in view of death, did will and bequeath to Richard Levering, his nephew. Signed in the presence of three witnesses. When Bessie had finished, she said:

"Look, Mrs. Levering! is it genuine? Look, Earl."

"Bless you for that news," he said, and bent and kissed the girl by his mother's side. "Yes, there is no doubt of its being genuine."

"I am Richard Levering's granddaughter and his heir; and which, by the decency he at last has paid, and dropped the document into the fire.

Mrs. Levering started forward with an exclamation, but too late; it shrivelled up and was burned.

Bessie had also left the room.

"Mother, you are reprehensible if that angel has not now gained your heart. I think she carries her amiability to an excess, in refusing me, as my will and testament declared."

"I cannot give it, Earl. I have led Bella always to believe that she would be your wife. I cannot encourage your intimacy with another."

"I'm a puppet, I suppose! Next week I leave for Europe, only to return when Bessie Lynn will be my wife," and the stern gentleman took his leave.

Two months have passed. Mrs. Levering is a gentle and affectionate as ever to Bessie.

Earl Levering had indeed taken the first steamer for Europe.

One morning, as Bessie sat with Mrs. Levering, Bella Hunt came to the room in hoonet and walking-dress.

"Aunt," she said, "I have news for you! I am now a relation of Bessie's, I married this morning to Mr. Richard Levering Willis Lynn."

"Oh, child, why did you not tell me! did you, too, think that I was opposed to your happiness? Bessie, my child, I understand, I comprehend you, and let this disunited family again find peace."

That evening Mrs. Levering wrote a letter that her heart had long dictated.

Months passed by, and Bessie one morning opened the package that when a child she had seen Earl Levering place in keeping, as a sacred story." What was her confusion to find within a magnificent diamond pin, earrings and ring. "My child," Mrs. Levering said the long day before spoke again to Bessie's heart, "I have always refused to part with these jewels, preferring to keep them for Earl's wife, and now I unclasped you from their proceeds. Do with them as you wish, they were the gift of my father. Do not thank me, above all thank the God who gave you, and the parents who loved you." Tears were in Bessie's eyes as she looked at the jewels that had been a great source to her from her mother. Taking them over to show Mrs. Levering, she dropped back on one knee beside her. Some one opened the door and came in behind them, kissing first Bessie's forehead and then her cheek.

"Is it possible?" the young girl exclaimed, as she sprang to her feet.

"Is it an acceptable arrival?" and again she sent the impassioned kiss of love into her face.

"Child," Mrs. Levering said, solemnly, "I wrote to Earl that as his wife you would be the most acceptable of daughters. Do you indeed love him as he thinks?"

"Answer her, Bessie. I will not let your hands go until you do."

A rosy flush spread over the glad face, and the sweet, truthful eyes looked up into his own, as she replied:

"I love him as I love my life—I love him with my whole heart."

And the little one who had called herself Cecilia could found a home and rest.

THRILLING SCENE—CAVING IN OF A MINE.

The Gould and Curry mine at Virginia City, Nevada, is the greatest bonanza in the Territories. It has been extensively worked, and employs some 220 men. The ore taken out daily amounts to about 100 tons, and averages from $30 to $200 per ton. On the night of the 6th of February a tremendous ore occurred in the mine, and, though it came down suddenly, while all the men in the mine were at their usual stations, yet not a man was injured. Some of them were within 30 feet of the cave, which occurred just as the men were taking their lunch. They were much frightened and bewildered, and all fled from the blown mine. The length of the cave was about 100 feet, its width some 60 feet, and the depth to which it extended 375 feet. The cave-in rather ahead of the old chambers that had been worked out were filled without extra cost to the company. Rich ore was exposed from the chambers above, and the hole on the hill caused by the cave-in about as large as an ordinary dining room.

The falling of several thousand tons of earth and rock to the depth of 375 feet, crushing through timber 30 or 40 plank floors, and crushing to stone thousands of feet of square timber, was, of course, attended with a terrible noise, and a fearful quaking of the earth in the vicinity. The concussion in the immediate neighborhood was high throughout the mine; workmen who were standing in the upper drifts were thrown to the bottom as the cars were thrown from the track, and the chambers, timbers, and rock were shaken as when Niagara Falls is the rolling clouds of dust. The air was forced south, into the drifts and mine, and strongly charged with it; the mine was extinguished, cars thrown off their tracks, about 100 lights extinguished, and all was dark as night. The air up the tunnel blowing short (nearly 400 feet deep) and all the lights in the mine blown out by the blast. The engine stands in a room partitioned off from the main building, and at the time of the cave-in, standing of the shaft, was so great was the concussion that the engine-room floor was thrown up an inch or two.

The terror of those in the mine we can easily imagine "Thunder and lightning" was everything in the "situation" to inspire terror. A more than midnight darkness, the air laden with dust, the deep roar, the awful rumbling of bursting floors, the deafening reports of the timbers breaking, the falling of the cars, and the grinding rocks, producing flashes and timbers, to say nothing of the shouts of the men, and the cries of those who thought the mine was on fire, and where it would end. After the cave was over, the men in the mine crept out as they could find day, after forty-four hours of darkness. Some getting down to the bottom of the mine, others by the air shaft, others by the ladder-ways. Several men in the Savage were also much frightened, and came out as they could find day. The power of God saving all the whole Gould and Curry had saved it, and that everything else was killed. Not a man was killed, standing at a considerable distance from the mine, and many were the gratitudes to every one for the preservation of an earthquake. The cave injured nothing in the mine except the ore that was taken out, and was taken out, all the men being at work, and everything going on as though no cave had occurred.

MANUFACTURE OF PERFUMES.

CONTRARY to general belief, nearly all the perfumes derived from flowers are not made by distillation, but by the processes of pressing, maceration, and by maceration or infusion. The odors of flowers do not, as a general rule, exist in them as a store, or in a free state, but are developed as they decompose. While the flower breathes it yields fragrance; but kill the flower, and the perfume ceases. It has not been ascertained what the discovery was made of condensing, and preserving the flower odors. Suppose that what we know now is that, if a living flower be placed near to fresh butter, or fresh lard, or oil, these will slowly take the odor given off by the blossom, and in turn themselves become fragrant. It was spread from lard to butter upon the inside of two dessert-plates, and then the flowers put in the centre, with gentle pressure, out of delicate, covering them over with the second greased plate. In a day or two, and after very few days, the grease has become fragrant. The blossoms, though they have given out their perfume, do not look worse since, but live and retain color, which is absorbed by the fat. The flowers are then removed, the fat is found to be scraped off the plates and put into alcohol; the odor is dissolved by the alcohol, and we have the oil which the tradesmen "scents," and the grease again becomes odorless.

The flower farmers of the Var follow precisely this method of extracting the delicate perfume from the tropical variation, with the following flowers—rose, orange, jasmine, violet, tuberose, cassie, and rose.

The commercial importance of this branch of perfumery may be seen from the fact that 100 pounds of roses annually grown in the district of Cannes, Flower jasmine, 300,000lb.; violets, 75,000; acacia, 40,000lb.; tuberose, 30,000lb.; cassie, 30,000lb.; orange flowers, 30,000lb. The quantity produced at Nice has not been ascertained; but it must be very large, as there are, in the vicinity, more than here stated.

The annual harvest for orange flowers at Nice lasts for more than a month, as an average, and during that time the entire gold and silver is to be collected daily, and a ton of flowers will yield more than a hogshead or otto jar of water. Worth $100; and when distilled, water, highly charged with odor, is worth another $50 more.

The rose harvest lasts about the same length of time. The annual produce weight of flowers, valued at an average at two francs the pound, is 1,000,000 francs. The annual produce of orange crop, growing as they do under the orange and lemon trees, is valued at 500,000 francs. The annual produce of violet-blossoms are produced annually at Nice.

The annual produce of flowers in perfume has risen to the annual value of $15,000,000.

ARTHUR'S HEIGHT.—This fine estate fronting the Potomac, and include those opposite side of Georgetown, is known as Arlington. Four years ago Robert E. Lee was a distinguished colonel of cavalry in the United States army, and late Commander-in-Chief of the rebel army, was the owner of this magnificent property, and a prominent inhabitant. More than one-half of the fabric was completed, and a thousand acres of land, covered with a splendid forest of oak and other timber, and the rich alluvial soil was devoted with the highest cultivation. To-day what a change! The venerable ancestral mansion of the Lees, honored as the birth-place of one of the Fathers of his Country, and for half a century his celebrated residence, is a ruin. Around it are the graves of the cemetery of those who have fallen in the service of their country in the late rebellion, and the grounds and estate surrounding the mansion have been permanently appropriated by the Government for the interment of the deceased by every patriotic impulse. Here the dead are deposited by their presence at the obsequies. That memorial grove, this selected by the owner as the last resting-place for himself and his, has been, in the temporary of Lee's absence, desecrated, and has been transformed into a field of the dead, and now numbers columns marking the remains of Generals Sumner, Pierre Custis and Mary Lee Fitzhugh, his wife, sleeping in the midst of more than 4,000 patriot soldiers' graves. The trees of the grove have been cut down, the land swept from the entire estate and used for war purposes. The Quartermaster's Department is actually in charge of the land thus cleared, and is still being put under cultivation by contraband negro labor.

THE DYING MOMENTS OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN, AT WASHINGTON, SATURDAY MORNING, APRIL 15.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, ALBERT BERGHAUS.

THE LITTLE MERMAID.

"Tell me, are there no means by which I can obtain an immortal soul?"

"It is true if thou could'st so win the affections of a human being as to become dearer to him than either father or mother, if he loved thee with all his heart, and promised, whilst the priest joined his hands with thine, to be always faithful to thee, then his soul would flow into thine, and then would'st thou become a partaker of human bliss!"

Down below the sparkling water,
Mid her treasure bright and rare,
Sits the scaking's beauteous daughter,
Ruler o'er golden hair.
Ever she's she's softly sighing,
While the heaving billows roll,
Give to me a mortal lover!
Give me an immortal soul!
If some child of earth would love me,
Breathing tender words and sighs,
Like the orbs that beam above me,
I might dwell in amber skies.

Sad thy fate, oh fair sea-maiden!
From this dream thou'lt wake to prove,
Hearts are as pale gold o'erladen,
When they build on human love!
Better lie below the billow,
Wrap'd in sea-weed's deadly fold,
Than live on and wear the willow,
For a love pass false and cold.
Still below the sparkling water,
Mid her treasures bright and rare,
Happy dwells the scaking's daughter,
Free from love, and love's despair.

GUY'S FOLLY;

OR,

The Secret of Thornton Heath.

BY VANE IRETON ST. JOHN.

AUTHOR OF "THE LASS OF RICHMOND HILL," "THE WORLD'S VERDICT," ETC.

CHAPTER I.—"IF YOU SIN, IT IS FOR HER SAKE," HE WHISPERED.

SIM looked like a summer cloud tinted with the roses of the sunset, as she sat there in her dress of lace and gauze in the glow of the red fire.

Dazzlingly fair and exquisitely beautiful was she, with eyes of blue and hair of gold, and skin which the rude wind had never roughened or the hot sun discolored.

The room in which she sat was the best room in Nightingale Lodge, yet it was large and oldfashioned in its style, and the furniture was a relic of a bygone day.

The old fireplace was high and wide, and huge logs burned brightly on its iron stand; the narrow windows, fitted with tiny panes, were shaded by tapestry; the ceiling, in one part ornamented, was in another part crossed by a heavy beam; and from the dark panelled walls frowned down the grim faces of knights in armor, and the prim beauties, too, of long, longsago.

And over the antique chairs, and tables, and couches, and over the old pictures, and the blackcoved ceiling, and the heavy tapestry, and the bright flame kindled by the chimney-corner, the light flickering flames fell merrily, as if the fire god were rejoicing at the departing winter.

Few rooms indeed could have felt with more joy in the presence of such an angel as Ella Raymond.

Yet there was one sitting by her side, whose eyes, dazzled keenly upon the fire, were scarcely raised, even when she spoke.

This was her husband, Walter Raymond.

He was young, like herself, and the glow of health was on his cheek, and the strength of manly beauty in his form.

Yet his expression and his features—how different!

He was tall, well built, as I have said, and upsmall, white hands proved sufficiently his style of gentleman.

His face was oval, his nose straight, though somewhat heavy, his eyes black—black as the curling hair which shadowed his pale forehead.

It was those which gave expression to the face of what speaks to you of a heart within—a heart eager, impulsive, quick to acts of generosity, yet capable of being turned aside into the darker channels of folly, and even crime.

At this moment, when the light of day had faded out, and the shadows from without were creeping in, he was sitting near his young wife, with his eyes, as I have said, peering into the fire, and his white hand nervously playing with his knee.

The young wife glanced at him in sorrow.

"Dear Walter," she said, passing her arm around his neck, "dear Walter, will you not tell me your trouble?"

Her husband recoiled, as if the soft, warm arm which glided over his shoulder was the coiling of a venomous snake.

"Ella," he said, in a low voice, as he drew her hand down and pressed it between his strong palms—"Ella, I have told you my trouble. You know that my endeavors to relent in the slightest degree know that my last shilling is spent—you know that ruin stares me in the face! Need I say more to explain why I feel despairing? Need I say more to render you more sympathizing with my terrible dave and sleepless nights?"

There stood in the young wife's eyes.

"Sympathies with you, Walter?" she said, in a tone of murmuring tenderness—" sympathize with you? You know how I love you—how, then, can you ask me such a question?"

He pressed her hand gently.

Then there was silence for a few moments.

The one was thinking of the future—she of the past.

Yet in that past she could find little to regret.

A poor though beautiful and accomplished girl, she had married Walter Raymond in direct opposition to the wishes of his uncle, Guy Raymond, who had been appointed his guardian at the death of his father.

This uncle—a rich and miserly man—had selected from among his set not a young lady of anything but amiable disposition, but possessing an ample fortune, which was the object of Guy's ambition.

This lady—Lady Isabella Tampleton—was dark, haughty beauty a year or two the senior of Walter Raymond, who, possessing also a considerable amount of attention, wound up the comedy by eloping one fine day with the girl he really loved.

Lady Tompleton's family were terribly scandalised, and Guy Raymond declared that his nephew was thenceforward an outcast and a stranger.

Either Walter did not believe that his guardian was in earnest, or he was intoxicated with the exquisite beauty of his wife.

At any rate, he seemed to take little note of his misfortune; but hugging himself up with the idea that the small fortune left him by his mother would last him until his uncle relented, he retired with his bride to Nightingale Lodge, a pretty villa situated about two miles from his uncle's residence.

A year had now passed away, and we find the young couple seated in sorrow and mourning over lost hopes.

Guy Raymond was obdurate.

Again and again had Walter appealed to him to his sense of justice—even to his generosity.

But in vain.

"I have my own money," pleaded Walter; "money left to you by my father in sacred trust for me. Why keep it from me?"

"Because you have chosen faith with me and your father," returned his uncle. "If Walter marries against your consent, he loses all inheritance; much more your property is hung upon it. You have done so—you lose your property, and I have performed my duty."

And now the last farthing was spent—borrowing had been exhausted—the sale of home and a wasting weary life seemed all to be looked forward to.

And yet amid all these was one thought which lit up half into joy the young wife's sorrow.

"Why does he plead longer—why does he undergo the humiliation of begging to one who will never relent? Why, he does he not work? Oh, if I were a man, would I not work?"

Yet she could not ask him to throw aside his pride and work to earn a maintenance.

So throwing her soft arm around his neck, again she sobbed out:

"Dear, dear, did you marry me, dear Walter? It is I—I alone who have brought you to all this trouble!"

He smiled fondly upon her.

"Talk not thus, dear one," he cried; "there is sunshine behind the cloud. This very night I have, I may under my consent, or to force him into submission. It is my own money I have a right to—"

He stopped suddenly.

His wife glanced up into his face inquiringly.

The fierce passions which were painted plainly upon his features changed her, and she drew his head down upon her bosom, as if both to thrill the throbbing pain of his forehead, and to hide from herself the terrible emotions visible upon his face.

"Why not speak on, Walter?" she whispered; "can there be anything you fear to tell me?"

"No, dearest," he faltered, raising himself up, as if he were deserting her, and could not speak falsely with his head resting on her guiltless breast; "no, dearest—I stopped because a new thought flashed across my forehead, and by aside from herself the terrible emotions visible upon his face.

"Why not speak on, Walter?" she whispered; "can there be anything you fear to tell me?"

"No, dearest," he faltered, raising himself up, as if he were deserting her, and could not speak falsely with his head resting on her guiltless breast; "no, dearest—I stopped because a new thought flashed across my forehead, and by the bye, I may under my consent, or to force him into submission. It is my own money I have a right to—"

He stopped suddenly.

"No, dearest," he faltered, raising himself up, as if he were deserting her, and could not speak falsely with his head resting on her guiltless breast; "no, dearest—I stopped because a new thought flashed across my forehead, and by the bye, I may as well mention it!"

At this moment there was a knock at the outer gate.

"Who can that be?" asked Ella, in tones of surprise, unmingled with alarm. "Who can wish to visit us to-night."

"I expect Gideon Crawleigh here this evening," said Walter, avoiding his wife's gaze.

"Gideon Crawleigh!"

"Yes—why need you exclaimed petulantly. "I have business with him."

Ella shuddered.

"Oh, dear, dear! I loathe that man!" she cried. "He will be your ruin, Walter, mark me. Once an enemy, always an enemy; and yet you deem him your friend!"

Ere Walter could reply, a servant entered.

"Mr. Crawleigh desires to see you," said the girl.

"Where is he?"

"In the hall."

"Show him up then; and you, Ella, will you grace for a few moments into the next room."

Ella rose gladly.

The very sight of Gideon Crawleigh was so hateful to her that she eagerly embraced any opportunity of avoiding a meeting.

In another minute Mr. Gideon Crawleigh entered the room.

Let me describe him.

He was a man whose face accorded ill with his body.

He was a pale face, without a vestige of beard, or moustache, or whisker—a face rendered more loathsome by the small, cold, gray eyes, which were shaded by his somewhat heavy brows, and the eternal smile which hovered round his thin, ghastly mouth.

He affected an ecclesiastical long coat, and a white neckcloth, and parted his hair in the centre in the form of a Saxon arch.

But this style of dress hardly accorded with his physical proportions, for his frame was stoutly built, and a tall figure did not disguise the immense bulk of his muscles.

He smiled his usual grim smile as he entered.

"I fear I have driven Mrs. Raymond away," he said. "I am sorry to have disturbed her."

"Mrs. Raymond went out of the room to oblige me, Crawleigh," returned Walter, as he handed him a chair; "so don't make yourself uneasy on my account, but sit down and talk of business."

Meanwhile, Ella Raymond, on passing out of the room, entered an adjoining one.

But here she could not rest.

Some secret voice seemed prompting her to play the eavesdropper; but though she yielded to it at length, it was not until after a long struggle with herself.

Even then it was not because she could not trust her husband, but because she felt convinced that Gideon Crawleigh would lead him to mischief.

So, placing herself near the door, she stooped down and listened.

Her effort was a failure, though she heard enough to make her shudder and tremble, for they were talking in low tones, and it was only when her husband uttered some horrible vow of vengeance, that she could distinguish anything.

At length Gideon Crawleigh rose, saying aloud:

"We had better go at once, Raymond, or we shall be late."

Then Ella crept away, and in another moment Walter's voice was heard calling her back.

He noticed that she trembled, and that her hands were icy cold.

"What is the matter, dear?" he said, gently; "are you ill?"

"No, Walter; only there is no fire in the room yonder, and it is chilly."

"I am going out a little while, Ella," he said.

"Going out?"

"Yes, dear, why not? May I not go out if I wish?"

She crouched down in her chair by the fire, and clasped her hands helplessly. It was the first time he had ever spoken to her coldly, and the words penetrated to her heart.

"I never prevent you doing what you please, Walter," she said, in a low murmur. "You know why I was surprised, however. Mr. Gideon Crawleigh is not the companion I should choose for my husband."

He was leaning over her as she spoke, and did not answer her.

He was gazing down upon her face and form with infinite tenderness and love.

She fancied he was doubting, and proceeded, as she looked up at him:

"Oh, don't go, Walter; this once—this once, don't go. I fear—"

A spasm of pain passed over his face; but he kissed her gently, saying:

"Yes, dear Ella, I must go!"

Then he walked across the room to the spot where Gideon stood; and as he stopped for an instant and looked back, he saw that she had buried her face in her hands, and was weeping.

"I wish I were not going, Crawleigh," he said; "I've half a mind to give it up even now."

"Give it up, and leave her to starve! No; come now, as you have before determined. Remember," he whispered, "if you sin, it is for her sake."

So saying, he passed his arm through that of his friend, and drew him out of the room.

Passing through the hall, they were soon out in the night, and walking rapidly in the direction of Thornton Heath.

CHAPTER II.—"HE SHADOW WAS LIKE THE FORM OF HIS MASTER HOVERING DOWN UPON HIM FROM YON SKIES."

RAYMOND MANOR—or, as it was more generally called by the neighborhood, Guy's Folly—was situated, as I have said, some two miles from Nightingale Villa.

It was a handsome, long the rough parish road, not a village, nor a spire, nor a porter's lodge was to be seen.

Here, even, were the corn-fields—wide spaces of unenclosed common opened, solitary and primitive, on the road, bordered by large woods, chiefly of beech, closing the horizon with ridges of undulating green.

In such an England, Knights Templar might have ridden in their way to scattered monasteries, or fugitive partizans in the bloody wars of the Roses have found shelter under leafy coverts.

Here, even, was the romance, its keep—half savage, half gentle—lording, perforce, the mind of any cultivated and imaginative gazer far back from the present to days—waking up long-forgotten passages of old poets.

There was no lodge at the carriage gate of Raymond Park, as it was called by courtesy.

The enclosure, indeed, was little beyond that of a good-sized paddock—its boundaries were visible on every side, but its grassy splendor, covered with massy foliage, sloped downwards to its wild, irregular turf soil—soil poor for pasturage, but pleasant to the eye, with its dell and dingle, herds of fantastic palisades, dotted oaks and elms, and here and there a weird, hollow thorn-tree, and patches of fern and gorse.

At the rear of the house lay a piece of water, extensive large enough to be redeemed from the name of pond.

The house itself was small, low, ancient—dating, it may be, from the time of the sixth Edward; a vast weight of roof, with high gables; windows above projecting over those below; a covered porch, with what was once a coat of arms panelled on the oak door.

Such was the residence of Guy Raymond—the miser, as he was justly termed; and here, from his early youth, he had lived with but one old servant to wait upon him.

The house had been delivered up to him by its predecessor in as good a state of preservation as could be expected in so old a structure; but now all was clouded over with the dull glaze of time.

The windows were in some places broken, the stonework was green, and here and there the trail of some insect or reptile was smeared up the walls.

The pillars of the porch were disfigured by ugly cracks; and here and there the roofwork had been carried away by birds, or in larger pieces by the storm.

Guy Raymond paid no heed to the wear and tear of time.

His life was mental, and mental, too, the labor, which left little room for the labor of the body.

What cared Guy Raymond that people called his home his Folly?

What cared he that the hand of time left heavily its traces on the exterior of the place—that the roof, and the walls bulged, and the huge timbers were but rotten within, and greened and streaked beneath the slightest storm?

What did he care for this, so that he was strong, and hearty, and well, as he was assuredly, and could stride magnificently along the old halls and the pleasant grounds?

He was a strange man, this Guy Raymond, in appearance as he was in mind.

A tall, broad-shouldered, well-built man, with a walk like that of a lion.

His face was of a noble cast, with large bright eyes of a hazel color, and a well-shaped mouth, massive jaws, and a noble brow, and broad forehead.

His hair was long and white, and fell in curling waves over his shoulders.

Yet this man—noble in mien and proud in bearing—was a miser.

Why was this?

That was his secret.

Towards the residence of this strange being it was that Walter Raymond and Gideon Crawleigh directed their steps on the spring evening on which I have introduced them to my readers.

Passing through a lane which led, onward Thornton Heath, they soon reached the dreary scene I have described above and reached the park gates.

These gates were formed between low pillars of wood, which it was easy for any one to climb over, and no motive of care or safety could induce the old man to repair or renew the inconvenience.

Few persons, indeed, believed it worth the while of a thief to venture a burglary at Guy's Folly, for though large enough to comprise three that he had large sums of money at Tillotson's Bank, no one knew the fact which Walter Raymond knew only too well, that the money was always kept in his house a large hoard of gold, which he delighted to gloat over and count, and for love of it, as it said, lost the love he hated it, and gloried in every coin of which he deprived the world.

Walter Raymond, as I have said, had pleaded and entreated in vain; and now, looking upon the money as his own, he had resolved seize upon it by force.

Shallow reasoning this.

Rightly or wrongly his father had left the money on certain conditions, and these conditions he had violated.

The money, then, was not his, but his uncle's.

Rightly or wrongly, however, had a stronger mind than he.

When—creeping serpent that he was—he had heard Gideon Crawleigh hint the plan to Walter Raymond, after they had been face for years, he set his mind to the task of wearing away even the last feeling of love and duty which still remained in Walter's mind.

He succeeded but too well.

Walter Raymond, naturally weak, soon yielded to the master mind; and as they took their way that night across Thornton Heath, it would not have been difficult, during the side of the stronger one, and looking up for health an d strength where he should have fled away, as if from the very spirit of darkness itself.

Gideon Crawleigh saw how he had conquered, and noted the pair of tempters, while in reality he had found his victim with the strong chains of mutual interest and mutual sin and sorrow.

It was he who had persuaded Walter that it was no crime to take what was his own—that the real criminal was Guy Raymond; and even as they passed together across the heath, he whispered to his companion:

"Bravo, Walter, this is the one brave deed of your life!"

At length they neared the house, and, creeping along by the palings, chose a spot where the wood-work was somewhat broken away.

Over this they climbed, and were soon passing beneath the shadows of the old pollards.

Walter Raymond knew the way well. He had lived so long in the old house, that he was aware of every nook and corner where an entrance could be effected; and accordingly he approached a spot where the ground swelled up against one of the bulging walls of the old dwelling, he loaned against one of the overhanging windows.

Clambering up this, as he had done once before that period, he gained a ledge, and stood standing on the window-sill, and entered the room.

After him followed Gideon Crawleigh.

The latter stooped a moment to unbuckle, and Walter glanced eagerly at the face of his companion, who was standing in the full light of the room.

He looked at him to see if he flinched, and to see, too, if there was fear of recognition.

There was no sign of flinching there, and scarcely a glance of recognition.

The great roll of cloth around his neck disguised completely the sacerdotal white choker, while the black hat had given way to a rough cap.

A heavy overcoat, too, with a flapping collar, covered the black frock; and only, in fact, a small part of the ghastly white face could be seen.

"Which way now?" whispered Gideon.

Walter started as from a reverie.

He had been, for an instant, thinking of the past, and contrasting it with the present, which brought him into his uncle's house like a thief.

"Follow me!" he said, in a hushed voice. "The old man keeps his money at the end of yonder corridor."

They crossed the room noiselessly.

At the door, Walter halted.

"Stay!" he said; "we like his throat. I know the place well—you don't. You may blunder and make a noise; so let me go on myself. Leave the door open, and if you hear me whistle, or cry out, pass along to the left, and enter the fourth door which will then be open."

"Very well," returned Gideon. "You know best."

Nothing could have suited him better. He could then ensure his own escape, should any peril present itself.

So he stood in the dark little room which had once been Walter's bedroom, while the young man passed along the corridor, feeling his way in the dark as one accustomed to its gloom.

A faint key sounded like music on the eagerly-sought chamber, and in a few moments he was kneeling by the side of his sadon chest, in which the special treasure of the miser was deposited.

He knew his uncle's early habits, and feared, therefore, no interruption; so he never thought of closing the door, or hiding himself from observation.

The chest was seen open, and the much-coveted treasure was before his eyes.

Oh! how his eyes glistened, and how eagerly his hands clutched the glittering coins.

Into every pocket he thrust them, until they strained with the weight, and he could scarcely rise from his knees.

He did rise, however, and, going back to his companion, transferred the treasure to him.

Then he returned, and once more locked himself with the golden treasure.

He had scarcely time to fill his pockets, when he felt himself, as it were, encompass-ed in a shade, which, as it lay upon the floor, took the form of a human being.

It seemed like the shadow of his dead father hovering down upon him from the skies.

The rubbish around him he wore, within in himself, and glanced up timidly.

Just in time he glanced to see the tall figure of his uncle passing the door, with his hands grasped, and his white head bent, as it were, in sorrow.

He seemed so still—so like a moving statue—that Walter could not demand him an apparition had he not heard the echoes of his stealthy footsteps.

A shudder ran through his frame. What could his uncle be doing? Where could he be going?

He did not stay long to conjecture, however, but, rising up, he crept noiselessly out into the passage.

At the end of this corridor was a large window, through which the moonlight streamed in, in a broad bell, full upon the form of the old man, who seemed bending down in prayer to the bright stare which twinkled above him.

Not many moments did the young man pause.

With fear, rather than remorse, in his heart, the young man passed away to join his companion, whom he found leaning out of the window, quietly gazing at the scene around him—a gentle pastoral, clothed in peaceful moonlight.

"You've come at last, then?" he said, dreamily. "I thought perhaps you had a squeamish fit, and gone down on your knees to your uncle."

"No," returned Walker, with a forced laugh; "I'm not likely to do that. I have my pockets full of money, and I'm anxious to get away."

He leaned out and drew a branch of an elm towards him, and, stepping down to the ground, they were soon rapidly retracing their steps across the heath.

"How much do you think we have got?" asked Walter, as they trudged on wearily.

Gideon Crawleigh laughed loudly.

"I should think it was something considerable by the weight," he said, "something about two thousand apiece, I should think. But, by the way, Walter, how do you propose to divide it?"

"As we said."

"And how was that?"

"You were to have one-third."

Gideon did not answer for a moment.

Then he said, "Very good; we will do so, I will call together with you the remaining shares."

"I will be there," said Walter.

"And when shall we make another trip?"

"When you please."

"In a week, then."

In a short time, after various resks, they arrived at Nightingale Lodge, at the door of which they parted company.

On entering the house, Walter found that his wife was still up, waiting for him in the drawing-room.

He crept up to her, and passed his arm around her neck.

"Dear Ella," he said, as she looked up gratefully into his face, "you do not have much pleasure. You can go to the fête to-morrow; for I have received some money to-night."

The unhappy wretched him made him forget for the moment whence the money came

GOD FOR OUR LAND.

WE'LL conquer! we'll conquer! No tears for the dying,
The portal to Heaven be the field where they're lying;
We'll conquer! we'll conquer! No tears for the pain,
Our God angels will smile on their death-hour of pain.
On, on in our massed dense, resolute, strong,
To war against treason, oppression, and wrong;
On, on with your chieftains, and Him we adore
Who strikes with the harvest and leads with the foremost,
Who brings the proud light of a name great in story,
To guide us through danger, uncompassed by glory.

With faith like the Hebrews we'll stem the Red Sea,
Our shield down the Pharaohs—our trust is in Thee.
Be it blood of the tyrant or blood of the slave,
We'll cross it to Freedom, or find there a grave.
Lo! a throne for each worker, a crown for each brow,
The palm for each martyr that dies for no-w:
Spite the flash of their muskets, the roar of their cannon,
The accessins of Freedom shall lower their pennon.
For the will of a nation what foe dare withstand?
Then, patriots, heroes, strike! God for our Land!

TWO SIDES OF A PICTURE.

SCENE I.

IT was the evening of a cold, stormy December day. The wind was still falling in fierce gusts, and the wind howled like a spirit thrice scourged as it swept through the dreary streets, driving those who were unfortunate enough to be exposed to its fury pitilessly before it.

Bright and cheerful gleamed the light from the windows of a handsome dwelling in one of the most aristocratic portions of Boston. Many a shivering passer-by cast a longing look at the house, imagining the luxuries and comforts within, and one old crone stumbling along with her bundle of kindling wood paused for a moment before it, crying out in bitter envy:

"Oh! it's little they know in there of the temptation of the cold.

"Little they know of the tempest." There was a worse tempest raging in that princely mansion than that of cold. It was a tempest of sin—a tempest of scorn and hate sweeping away all sense of duty and forbearance from a wife's heart; a tempest as angry, and fiercer passing than her husband's eyes; a tempest tearing apart two lives which had been bound together (the minister said by God), and which man had been forbidden to put asunder.

Margaret Delisle stood in the centre of her comfortably-furnished drawing-room, her whole form trembling with emotion.

In her eyes gleamed a look like that worn by a stag when at bay, and her small white hands were tightly clasped together.

On the sofa before her sat her husband; a man with sallowy swollen, fierce black eyes, overhanging brows and sensual mouth. His lips were drawn back from his gleaming white teeth, and his face was cruel in expression.

"I will not; I cannot submit to it," said the woman in a passionate voice. "Five long years, O God, five years of misery have I endured like the torture of the damned; all the most sacred feelings trodden in the dirt; my nature reviled; everything that money can buy! And I, myself, cast out of me; and you have done these things, and by what right, John Delisle? Because you are my husband, and love grows cold in the heart. You came and tempted me when I was weary and starving, saying, 'I will give you wealth; you shall be a queen in society, and no love you.' condescend to remember your existences. You shall have gems; a princely home; position; everything that money can buy.' And I, weak fool, listened to you, and, I impatient of my beautiful art, because she was coy, and yielded not to my first entreaties—poor I more than all because I was young and starving, married you. Oh! I could curse myself for having sacrificed the holy the soul; better to have died in my lonely room. What are my diamonds, my costly robes to me? They lumber my drawers—no love you. I never loved you. How could I when we had not one thought, one taste in unison? You have been unfaithful, and obtained all you desired. You thought me beautiful. You coveted my beauty to show off your wealth. You bought me that you might display me. You thought me that you might stare and wonder, and envy your possessions. You made me forswear my art-love. You bade me cast away my pencils and brushes, saying, 'The wife of John Delisle must not deal in trade like a common painter.' And I, again a weak fool, yielded to all your wishes, and for years I have smothered my love for genius; my hope that one day I might be able to touch her hand; but the fire within my heart has never been extinguished. It has been burning steadily, though you knew it not, and now, John Delisle, it has burst forth with redoubled fury. I am tired of playing the fashionable woman; I am sick to death of my golden chains; let me free; let me be myself!"

She paused, her bosom heaving with excitement, her hand upon her heart, her eyes glowing brighter than the diamonds she wore upon her brow.

Slowly and coldly, though rage was written on every line of his face his voice sounding strangely harsh and discordant after the rich full tones of his wife, John Delisle replied:

"You have so often heard my sentiments respecting your art-love" (with a sneer) 'that I need not repeat them now. If you remain in this house you must yield me the obedience you promised at the altar. You may not love me, but I'll have no rivals. Oh! you need not flash your blue eyes, I do not mean in the shape of lovers. I know that a woman so devoted to 'art' could find no room in her heart for any other worship. I am speaking of paints, brushes, canvass, and all that sort of thing. I require of you the key of your room, and to-morrow I will burn those things which have drawn your heart away from me. And, furthermore, I will have no wandering 'after the beautiful' no intimacy with artists. My wife shall not lower herself to the grade of those who, affecting to despise the conventionalities of life, starve in lonely rooms because of their pride. Margaret, you, Margaret, you, of that sphere, and out of it you must remain. Why, woman," and his voice grew harsh and cruel, "you were born to be a queen in society. I delight in your beauty. Have I not surrounded you with every luxury that wealth could procure, even to the diamonds the crystal, your face the richest?"

"Pshaw!" muttered his wife. "You are talking like a Sultan to his slave. You love me as a slave. I rebel; I cast off my chains; I will have my freedom. I am your purchase; my own life. They are as far from you as the heaven from the earth. Above your sordid love for gold shines my art love like a star. I will not give it up. It is all I have in life to glorify my God with. You may begin the work of destruction you threaten at once when I am out of my own sight; I have no longer your wife. I, myself, sever the bonds that unite me. Forth from your door I'll go poor as when I entered it a girl of only five years ago; five years that have been a continual torture to me; five years of falsehood and deceit; five years of inward shame and outward calm; five years of tyranny on one side, and well simulated obedience on the other. John Delisle, to-night I say to you farewell for ever!"

At last the man lost his sneering look. He rose from his seat, and moved to take her hand, but she repulsed him with the gesture of a queen.

"Margaret, are you mad?" he asked.

"Mad!" she laughed, a low, wild, low, mocking laugh. "No; just coming to my senses."

"You do not—cannot mean that you will leave me—leave your home for those silly, romantic ideas?"

"My God!" she moaned. "Silly, romantic! My, my God!"

"Think of what the world will say, Margaret," he continued.

"The world! Ah, yes the world must be considered. Well, the world will say that I'm insane or hopelessly base, ungrateful, unworthy, a wretch to run away from such a home as mine. The world will say how could she fail to be contented? She had so much to eat, and drink, and wear! A wise critic would say, 'Look at her gorgeous dress, but never dreams of the aching heart beneath; it envies the coronet of some, but never discovers the weary brain it encircles.' You have resolved. I leave you your silks, lace and diamonds. I give up the proud position I have held as mistress of this princely mansion. Farewell, society and a husband, but I find—liberty!"

"Take care, my lady Margaret," said John Delisle, his voice becoming tone, "or you may find—the devil!"

She opened her blue eyes and flashed a glance of disdain at him, then quickly left the room, which seemed to grow dark as the sky when a brilliant meteor falls from it.

It was true all Margaret Delisle had spoken. Left a penniless orphan at the age of eighteen, she had taken refuge in a garret, endeavored to carry out the dream of her childhood—that of becoming an artist. She was modest, reserved and unassuming, and she did not become known; she had no influential friends, therefore she starved. For a long and weary year she endured hunger, cold, and all the pleasant things that poverty is her to, and than John Delisle, strolling with a friend in the Academy of ——, was struck by a picture of a beautiful girl standing before one of the pictures. Her golden hair in its glossy waves about her broad low brow, and there—perfect—accomplishing suffering in her violet blue eyes.

She was miserably clad. A thin shawl, folded gracefully about her slight form, gave her no protection from the cold, and her little white hands were purple.

"Who is that?" asked Delisle.

"That," replied his friend, supposing he referred to the portrait, and not the artist, "is the fascinating Mrs. Le Brun, the pet of the——"

"I mean that girl yonder," interrupted Delisle. "Oh, that is a young unknown artist, Ipremne. Hem, Lee," addressing a fair-haired youth who was passing, "who is that pretty girl?"

"Miss Margaret Lawlor. Pretty,' did you say? She's beautiful. Has some talent (of course only some, being a woman); is as poor as poverty, and as proud as Lucifer. Au revoir!"

"Well, Delisle, are you satisfied? Why don't you answer? You seem to be lost in thought. What are you thinking of?"

"I was thinking," was the calm reply, "of getting that girl my wife."

"Your wife? Hear the man—he's gone daft!"

"Not quite, Lewis. I'm impressed that that golden-haired creature yonder will be Mrs. Delisle. And why not? She is beautiful, she is proud, and she is a lady."

"And, pray, how did you discover all that?"

"Simply by looking at her. You must learn to make better use of your eyes, Lewis."

John Delisle met this poor artist, and though at first she shrank from him with instinctive repugnance, with infinite tact he soon made her think of him with kindness, and he made her think of him constantly. One day it was a basket of the choicest fruit, the next a bouquet of the rarest flowers, books, birds, delicate wines, all offered so quietly, so unobtrusively, that she could refuse nothing.

At last he told her he loved her, he pictured his home to her, he spoke of the care and tenderness which should surround her. He appealed to her vanity (for, strange as it may appear, Margaret had a share), he called her pride to his aid, and spoke of those seeming her now as Margaret Delisle, and in no more than a month did John her friendship as Margaret Delisle. In short, he influenced her through the meaner part of her nature, and Margaret yielding, as many a wiser woman has before, consented to barter her youth and beauty for a home, her love of art (for John insisted that when his wife she should no longer paint) for a protector, her liberty for gold and precious gems.

And what came of it? What could come of it? Before a year was passed, aye, long before, Margaret Delisle found herself the victim—not for hours with her hands folded idly in her lap, wishing with all the fervor of her passionate heart that the cold room—the old life—even the old starvation.

She thought her husband to let her paint, but with a kiss, from which she inwardly shrank, he brushed it away.

John Delisle hated artists with a superior mediocrity, and a woman artist he regarded as a sort of monstrosity.

Ross Bonheur, in his opinion, had better remain at home and attend to the family's stockings or cooking the family's dinner, than strolling around in all sorts of rude places painting animals. Rosa Bonheur, in his opinion, was disgusting.

Pictures were excellent things in their way—he bought a few of them—as a rule, from his wife's portfolio, and hung them in the richest carpet, but where the picture-maker was better than the carpet-maker he could not see.

Beautiful Margaret Delisle queened it in "society." It was the only thing left for her to do. And she did it well. The woman spoke, she said imitated her style—the men, delicious, wellgot'ed, dress-coated creatures, voted her "charming." But she never knew a moment's peace in any of them, and the old light only came back to her face when by chance at some house where "art" was "fashionable" she met some artist friend. Then how wonderful the change—her cheek flushed rosy red—her blue eyes opened with a dazzling splendor, her voice became joyous and sweet, and her hearers wondered at her eloquence.

Only a few moments thus, for John Delisle was a jealous husband, and could not bear to see his wife growing more beautiful for another than for him-self. And so it would happen that Margaret, feeling his touch upon her arm, would turn, and gazing in that calm, smiling face, suddenly become pale and trembling.

Five years had passed away since her marriage, and Margaret began to have that wild hunted look in her eyes which remains invariably wears who never dares to act herself.

On the dark and dismal night of which I have written, sitting alone in her fashionably furnished room, she had been dreaming of the little studio —she had been cursing the hour she sold her brother's picture—she had been filled with all her soul, the man who owned her, when John Delisle, entering softly, bent to kiss her cheek.

Instinctively she rose and confronted him with the eyes of a tigress, and all the long pent-up passion of years burst from her heart forth.

For a moment John Delisle recoiled as though stricken by a bullet, but soon the cold tyranny of his nature resurrected itself. He held him to his peculiar ideas. He would not yield an inch. He was an obstinate, self-willed, practical man. She was a passionate, impulsive, high-strung poetical woman. When fire and water mingle two such natures will harmonize. Never before.

Like a storm-cloud burning the storm over, the sun rose in redoubled splendor, the tempest had also passed from John Delisle's house, and his wife Margaret was once again a poor artist.

In some instances ladies who can scarcely ling out "Yes" when they are married, learn to say "No" pretty quickly afterwards.

"DENNIS, my boy," said an English schoolmaster to his Hibernian pupil, "if ten I shall make twenty? You've no application."

"An' sure enough, sir," said the boy, looking down at his toes, "I always bring down me application on account for it." Don't ever every day in the newspapers that 'tis from each other we learn it all?"

WHAT is the difference between the color of Canada's coat and a frog's stomach? One is a sober drab and the other a drab-green.

WHEN can a man be said to be stung to the quick? When he is married!

SOMETHING often heard, but seldom seen.—A woman's tongue.

A KIND of angling that doesn't always take.—Fishing for compliments.

THE following is the verdict of a negro jury: "We, the undersigned, being a former's jury to sit on de body of Sambo, find dat he died and gone dere on his own accord, and dat he died by falling from de hinder side de ribber in de said ribber, and dat he was drowned in consequence of it, and afterwards washed on de other side, what we 'spose he was trying to get to."

IN the poems by Hoffman, the German poet, there is applied from the Persian dominions, the following word appears: "Sonnenverfinsterungsmethode sammenangelegenheit," meaning a sun which is struck by the constitution from the payment of taxes. The explosion of such a pet as this would be punished by the laws of prussia first by the code of Prussia.

A VERY valuable essence for family use is—acquiescence.

WHEN the members of a family are treated every night to a cat serenade, they soon become inwardly sick of it, not outward.

THE UNION ARMY ENTERING RICHMOND, VA., APRIL 3—RECEPTION OF THE FEDERAL TROOPS IN MAIN STREET.—From a Sketch by our Special Artist, Joseph Becker.

PALMETTO TREE.

OUR Artist has sent us a sketch of one of the very few remaining Palmetto trees now left in Charleston. It is opposite No. 116 East Bay street, and was planted some seven years ago. It is the only Palmetto tree remaining in that part of the ruined city.

SKETCHES IN RICHMOND, VA.

THE sketches which we publish in the present number are full of interest to all. They exhibit a mournful spectacle of a fallen and guilty city. Terribly indeed has the mother of Presidents paid for her grand treason against a Government which she has directed since the days of Washington. It is another proof of the depraving power of slavery, for whether the criminal blunder of Virginia's secession from the Union in '61 proceeded from arrogance of heart, or mental infirmity, it undoubtedly was the necessary result of that God-denying principle, engendered by a system which made one of its most influential judges declare "that there was a large class of human beings in this country whose rights a white man was not bound to respect."

The terrible sentence which the North has been called upon to make in expiation for its passive acquiescence in so infamous a doctrine has only been exceeded by the fearful and humiliating ruin which has visited its propagators and defenders. If ever mourning was in sackcloth and ashes it is what remains of the late Southern Confederacy, but the sketches of our Artist will prove more eloquent than any words, and we, therefore, present them with brief description.

Interior of Libby Prison.

Having in a recent number given a sketch of the exterior of this modern Bastile with a full description of the place, we have merely now to state that is now devoted to imprisoning the rebels.

Our Artist, who visited it on the 7th, sends us a graphic picture of its present appearance, which will appear in our next. He says, "A more miserable set o humanity I have never seen than the rebels who now occupy the old quarters once held by our brave boys.

"I am happy, however, to add, for the sake o humanity and the honor of the American name, that the treatment they receive from the United States Government is very different from that which our unfortunate fellows experienced.

"There is also an element in the rebel prisoners which did not exist in our men, for one of the saddest reflections on that Libby Prison now holds about a hundred of the greatest desperadoes who were released from jails and conditioned of fear entering the Confederate service." We trust that these men will not be considered as genuine soldiers and released when the war is over.

The Burnt District.

As we have already related, the rebel Government, when it evacuated Richmond, showed its usual contempt for human suffering by ordering the city to be fired in several places, and one of the chief duties when our troops took possession was to extinguish the conflagration. Our view represents the appearance of one of these burnt districts, looking up Carey street. Reasons as if both friend and foe had combined to punish this rebellious city.

Digging for Treasure.

How little confidence the wealthier class of Richmond rebels had in their own Government and soldiery is evidenced by the fact that so many of them buried their chief valuables. Much has now been lost in the ruins of the fire. Our Artist has sent us a sketch of the citizens digging among the ruins in Main street, where the fire made considerable havoc. The eager curiosity portrayed in the faces of the bystanders was a perfect study.

The Union Army in Richmond.

On Monday, the 3d of April, a portion of the Union army, under command of Gen. Weitzel, entered the capital of the defunct Southern Confederacy, and was received by all classes with either loud acclamations or silent satisfaction, for it would appear that even the most rabid Secessionists had had all hope of a successful result of their rash experiment. The colored population was, as might be expected, in a state of jubilant delight, and the gorgeous manner in which they thronged about the grounds of the capital, from which they had hitherto been rigidly excluded, was very amusing and highly characteristic of their childlike nature. In a word, this unhappy war seems to have lasted just long enough to convince the boastful population how fatal its defeat has been, and how futile it would be to renew the attempt to overthrow the determination of the majority. It has also continued long enough to destroy the cursed institution of slavery. Let us hope that they will also see what a pernicious curse the doctrine of States Rights has proved to be.

A HOURI VILLAGE.

COL. WALTER CAMPBELL has just published his "Indian Journal." Among the mountains of India he discovered a strange settlement of women, remarkable for beauty and fair complexions, who pride themselves on their charms, and make it a duty to transmit them to posterity by consorting only with husbands as fair as themselves. And, indeed, if Bhaw, whose portrait is given, is a true specimen of her tribe, their pride may be excused:

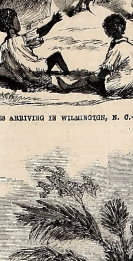
During the time we remained a few, we made an excursion along the coast to the neighboring village of Sarode, inhabited by a remarkable race of women, who are celebrated throughout the western parts of India for their great beauty and unusually fair complexion. They are Hindoos of the Coukaee caste, but differ in many respects from any other tribe. They are not allowed to marry, nor are any men, except the priest, belonging to the pagodas —of which there are several in the village—allowed to reside within its precincts. They are, however, encouraged to become mothers; and, like the Amazonian queens who is said to have visited Alexander the Great, in hopes of thereby obtaining a heroic daughter—they are very particular in selecting fathers, likely from their appearances to perpetuate in their children the fair complexion and classical features for which they themselves are so justly celebrated. I was not able to ascertain how the male children are disposed of, but I believe they are dedicated to the temples and become priests; while the females—or perhaps only the finer specimens, for all the children we saw were strikingly handsome —are reared with the utmost care to sustain the character of the village of Houris. Their origin is shrouded in mystery; but tradition says they are sprung from an ancient sisterhood of Portuguese nuns. A strange origin enough, if the tale be true. They never leave their native village—which they appear to think the most delightful spot on earth—but have a superstitious belief that if they were to ascend above the Ghauts they would immediately die.

On leaving near the village we pitched our tent on the beach, and, in accordance with the etiquette of the place, we dispatched a messenger to announce our arrival. We were soon after waited upon by a deputation of waiting females, who in the most graceful manner expressed their thanks for the honor we had done them, and informed us they were charged with a message from the matron of the village, requesting the pleasure of our company in the evening to witness a "nautch," and after throwing a garland of flowers round each of our necks, they returned to the village.

I was much struck with the grace and beauty of these young creatures. They were nearly as fair as Europeans, with beautifully regular features; and their deep black, melting eyes, filled with long silken eyelashes, were perfectly bewitching. It was that peculiar eye—rare even in Europe, and unknown in any other part of India—which Byron so beautifully describes as

> The Asiatic eye,
> Dark as above us in the sky;
> But through it steals a tender light,
> Like the first moonrise of midnight:
> Large, dark, and swimming in the stream,
> Which seems to melt in its own beam;
> All love, half languor and half fire.

Their figures were more stately, and their limbs fuller and better rounded, than those of Indian females generally are; and their peculiar dress—consisting only confined round the waist by a silver zone, and looped up on one side so as to expose the leg to a little above the knee—closely resembled the drapery of an ancient Greek statue. Their hair, simply braided, was entwined with wreaths of jessamine, and secured behind with a gold buckle. And the general effect of their costumes was not a little heightened by the unaffected sweetness and simple modesty of their demeanor. For, notwithstanding their strange customs—shocking "our ideas of propriety, not considering the matter per se"—even the poor things retain all the native modesty of their sex, and are not by any means masculine in their behavior.



In the cool of the evening we proceeded to the village, on the outskirts of which we were met by another deputation of the fair inhabitants, and conducted to the house of the head matron.

The village is beautifully situated in a grove of orange, citron and palm trees, through which the soft moonbeams came laden with perfume; a beautiful saltwater lagoon, wooded to the edge, sweeps by in front of it, and in the background the deep blue mountains appear to form a barrier between this enchanting spot and the remainder of the world.

We were received with great ceremony by the matron, and all the females of the village in a large open apartment, where we were sprinkled with rose-water, and regaled with tea. We then seated ourselves round the room to witness the performance of some "nautchgirls" belonging to the temple, and departed at a late hour, after distributing some little presents, such as embroidered slippers, bangles, &c., amongst the finest of our entertainers and taking a sketch of a beautiful creature named Bhaw.

ESCAPED SLAVES ARRIVING IN WILMINGTON, N. C.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

THERMOMETER ALARUM.—M. Morin has devised an instrument which may be enumerated among useful appliances. A greenhouse, for example, must be kept at a uniform temperature, but it may not be convenient to keep a man to continually observe the thermometer and attend to the fire. M. Morin has, therefore, contrived an instrument which will give notice whenever the temperature of the conservatory falls below the desirable point. It consists of an ordinary thermometer, the bulb of which a platinum wire is carried, another wire brought through the top down to the point marking the degree of heat required. These wires are placed in connection with a small battery and an electric alarum. It will now be seen that as long as the temperature is maintained the circuit is complete; but as soon as the mercury falls below the platinum wire the circuit is broken, and a small electro-magnet lets fall an armature, which completes a current and the alarum. This now begins to ring, and continues to do so until the temperature rises again to the proper height. Different adaptations of this instrument may make it useful in giving indications of changes of temperature in many industrial operations.

COMPOSITION FOR COATING WOOD.—A method of coating wood with a view to its hard a stone has been recently introduced in Germany; the ingredients are 40 parts of chalk, 10 of rosin, four of linseed oil, to be melted together in an iron pot. One part of native ochre is added, and one of sulphuric acid are then to be added, after which the composition is ready for use. It is applied hot to the wood with a brush, in the same way as paint, and, as before observed, becomes exceedingly hard on drying.

MANY FACTS IN A SMALL COMPASS.—The number of language spoken is about 3,064. The number of men is equal to the number of women. The average of human life is about 33 years. One-quarter die before the age of seven. Twenty 1,000 persons can rarely reaches the age of 100 years, and not more than one in 100 will reach the age of 86. There are on earth 1,000,000,000 inhabitants. Of these 33,333,333 die every year, 91,824 die every day, 3,768 every hour, and 63 every minute. These losses are balanced by an equal number of births. The married are longer lived than the single. Tall men live longer than short men. Women have more chances of life previous to the age of 50 years, but after that year the reverse. The greatest of mortality is in proportion of 70 to 100. Marriages are more frequent after the equinoxes, that is during the months of June and December. Those born in the spring are more robust than the others. Births and deaths are more frequent by night than by day.

A BRITISH officer, Capt. Ferguson, the lately visited this country, is lecturing in England on "America during the war." He describes the negro soldier in camp as follows: "A regular contraband is scarcely to be known than between the native American and the negro soldier of the army: the one grave, self-reliant and quiet, the other, gay, and strutting through the camp, saying his letter or reading his paper, or perhaps actually discussing politics with his neighbors; the other, lighthearted as a child, and yet with a grin passing by, you feel sure, of a monkey or at quarts with nothebows, or else gambolicky or frolicking in pure exuberance of spirits. All day long, whereby, too, where the negro laborers work, is a constant scene of animated repast. They are fond of their work well, too, but their aim seems to be to make it as like play as possible. Some one sings a line of a song, and wifey, for their labor seems to be a carnival of delight. So every their energies seem to spend in their sports to sing; for the day closes upon the same rollicking style of working as the same boisterous scene of merriment as that upon which it opened."

U. S. 7-30 LOAN.

By authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, the undersigned has been appointed Sub-Agent and Financial Agency for the sale of United States Treasury Notes, bearing seven and three tenths per cent. interest per annum, known as the Seven-Thirty Loan.

These Notes are issued under date of June 15th, 1865, and are payable three years from that time, in currency, or are convertible at the option of the holder into

U. S. 6-20 Six per cent.

GOLD-BEARING BONDS.

These bonds are worth a premium which increases the actual profit on the 7-30 loan. They are exempt from State and municipal taxation aside from one to three per cent., according to the laws of the State where property. The interest is payable in currency semi-annually by coupons attached to each note, which may be cut off and sold to any bank or banker.

The interest amounts to

One cent per day on a $50 note.
Two cents	" " "	$100 "
Ten	" " "	$500 "
20	" " "	$1,000 "
100	" " "	$5,000 "

Notes of all the denominations named will be promptly furnished upon receipt of subscriptions, and the interest to accrue from the date of investment. The notes are issued to bearer, and are transferable by delivery. This is

THE ONLY LOAN IN MARKET

which pays interest in advance. The interest now offered by the Government, and it is confidently expected that its superior advantages will make it the Great Popular Loan of the People.

Less than $300,000,000 of the Loan authorized by the last Congress are now on the market. The balance, the sale of which is being absorbed, will all be subscribed for within four months, when the notes will undoubtedly command a premium. We are ready to back the case on closing the subscriptions to other Loans.

In order that citizens of every town and section of the country may be afforded facilities for taking the loan, the National Banks, State Banks, and Private Bankers throughout the country have generally agreed to receive subscriptions at par. Subscribers will select such parties as they may have confidence in, and who only are to be responsible for the delivery of the notes for which they receive orders.

George Sand's Last Novel.

A YOUNG GIRL'S CONFESSION.

"A Young Girl's Confession" will rank among the best productions of its gifted author. Written in a powerful and, in many parts, eloquent language, the style of writing is peculiarly adapted to the subject of plot and character. For purity of sentiment, elevation of thought, enlarged clearness of statement, effective working up of the denouement, and the charm of interest throughout, we prefer all the "Confessions" is probably unequalled in French imaginative literature. ARRANDALE & CO., Manufacturers' Agents,
No. 189 Broadway, NEW YORK.

Announce that all the above list of goods will be sold for One Dollar each.

In consequence of the great stagnation of trade in the manufacturing districts of England, through the cotton famine, we have purchased, at a very large quantity of Valuable Jewellery, originally intended for the American market, but which we have on hand, and must be sold at ANY SACRIFICE.

Under these circumstances ARRANDALE & CO., act as Agents for the principal European manufacturers, and have issued the following Circular, in connection, subject to the following regulations:

1st—Certificates of various articles are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and well mixed. They are offered for sale without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving a fair chance.

2d—Each of the Certificates, you will see, what you are to have for $1. Send it to us, and we return you the dollar and take the article or NOT. Purchasers may thus obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, or any article of Jewellery on our list for ONE DOLLAR.

Send 29 Cents for Certificates.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, postage stamps must be enclosed when ordering. Certificates will not be sent when the Certificate is sent out. Purchasers will be sent for Certificate in sums of $5; sixty-five for 10; and a hundred for $20.

3d—We want agents in every regiment, and in every town in the country, and those who engage with us will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them. Agents will collect 25 cents by every One Dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents by every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us. Agents can work on this scheme.

ARRANDALE & CO.,
189 Broadway, New York.

What the "Press" say of Us.

GOOD GIFT ENTERPRISES.—A rare opportunity is offered to our readers to purchase Watches, Jewelry, silverware, etc., by Messrs. Arrandale & Co., at No. 167 Broadway, New York. Their circular is before us, and is very tempting in value, and all are offered for $1 each. The subscription is very fairly done. Parties have to take a certificate of a certain article, enclosed in an envelope, which is sent by mail, and when they receive it, if not satisfied with the article, which will certainly be worth the money, they can return it and get $1 back. This is an excellent mode this of investing a dollar.—Sunday Times and Noah's Weekly Messenger.

Messrs. Arrandale & Co. have long been personally known to us, and we can assure our readers that they are worthy of public confidence.—New York Scottish American Journal, March 11, 1865.

We have inspected, at the office of Arrandale & Co.'s Agency, a number of the certificates issued by this establishment of fashionable and valuable jewellery of the most elegant description. The articles are of solid silver, silver-plate, and understand that the whole of these articles are to be disposed of at one dollar each as a novel principle, giving great advantages to buyers, and affording extensive employment to agents. The name of the firm in question to be a very respectable and responsible one, deserving confidence, and readers may send our friends to read their advertisement.—New York Sunday Dispatch, 5, 1865.

By Messrs. Arrandale & Co.'s arrangement, the advantage seems to be on the side of the purchaser, as he has everything to gain, and nothing comparatively to lose. The Certificate costs only 25 cents, and the dollar hand, and he need not send it if he is not satisfied.—New York Evening Express, March 11, 1865.

EMPLOYMENT FOR LADIES.—The most eligible and profitable employment we have met with for ladies is the sale of certificates for the "Great Gift Distribution" of Messrs. Arrandale & Co., which distribution has been very successful in this way, not only filling her own pocket, but also in the hands of agents, who have made the sale of the Certificates, as will be seen from our advertisement to-day. Gentlemen can also be employed.—Leader, New York Sunday Mercury, Aug. 14, 1864.

We have examined the articles in the advertisement of Arrandale & Co.'s Gift Distribution of watches, jewellery and silver-plate, and, without any investment, we received several sets of the jewellery advertised, and we are warranted in saying that, both in finish and quality, they quite exceeded our expectations. They turned out to be just what they had been represented.—True Democrat (Louisiana), May 17, 1864.

The British Whig of Kingston, C. W., says, Nov. 26, 1864, one of our lady subscribers became an agent for Arrandale & Co., and by request brought some 20 articles, sent as prizes for her agency, to this office for inspection, and without hesitation we can state that each and all of the articles were worth treble the amount of cost to the recipients, and some of them six times.

ARCANA WATCH.

An Elegant Novelty in Watches.

The cases of this watch are an entirely new invention, composed of six different metals combined, rolled together and planished, producing an exact imitation of 18 carat gold, called Arcana, which will always keep its color. They are as beautiful and durable as solid gold, and are afforded at one-eighth the cost. The case is beautifully designed, with Panel and Shield for name, with Patent Push Pin, and engraved in the exact style of the celebrated Gold Hunting Levers, and are really handsome and desirable, and so exact an imitation of gold, as to defy detection. The movement is manufactured by the well-known St. Jimer Watch Company of Europe, and are superbly finished, having engraved pallets, fancy carved bridges, adjusting regulator, with gold balance, and the improved ruby jewelled action, with line dial and skeleton bands, and is warranted a good timekeeper. These watches are of three different sizes, the smallest being for ladies, and are all Hunting Cases. A case of six will be sent by mail or Express for $125. A single one sent in an elegant Morocco Case for $25, will readily sell for three times their cost. We are the sole agents for this watch in the United States, and none are genuine which do not bear our Trade Mark.

The Colliery owned by the Company is located in the second or middle coal basin in Mahanoy township, Schuylkill co., Pa., and upon veins that are a continuation of the celebrated Honeybrook range of the Lehigh coal basin. It has been in successful operation for the last six months, producing large quantities of the purest and best description of hard, free burning coal, which makes it especially desirable for household purposes. It is capable of producing and sending to market from 75,000 to 100,000 tons annually. The run which the Company has upon the veins is more than a mile long, and comprises more than 1,000,000 tons of coal above water level.

Every Stockholder is entitled to one ton of coal yearly, at cost, to each share of stock held by him. Should he not desire coal, then the profit upon the coal to which he is entitled will be paid to him in cash.

Should more than 60,000 tons of coal be mined during any year, the profits derived from its sale will be divided among all shareholders alike, whether they have or have not elected to take coal at cost.

The books for subscription to the capital stock are now open at the offices of the Company, 416 Broadway, corner of Canal street (upstairs), and 69 Broadway (first floor), where specimens of the coal may be seen. Full particulars given on application, either personally or by note.

☞ Shareholders who have already subscribed can send in their orders for coal, which is now ready for delivery. o

FRANK LESLIE'S

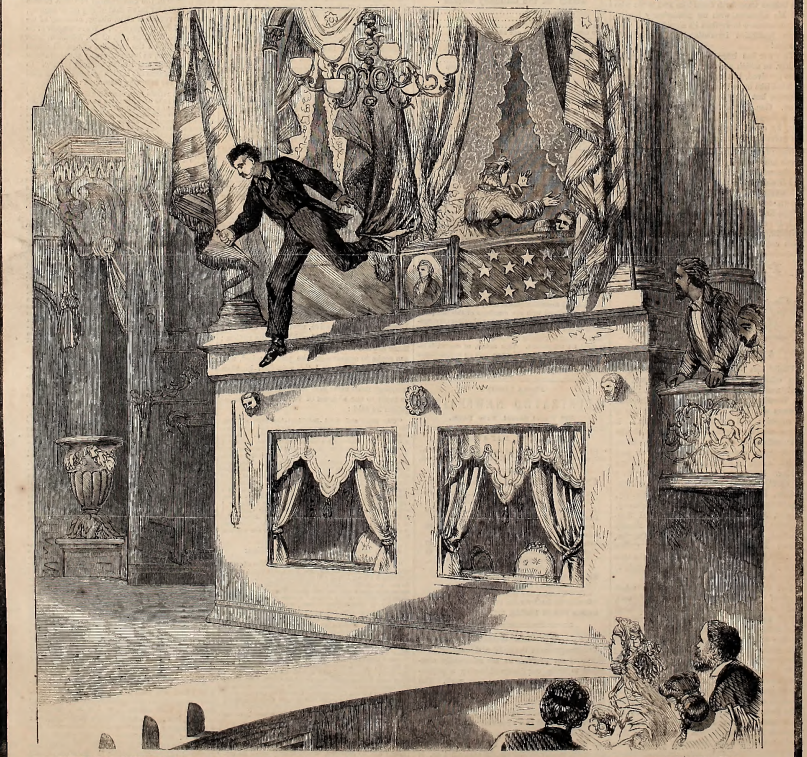
NEWSPAPER



Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1864, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 501—Vol. XX.] NEW YORK, MAY 6, 1865. [Price 10 Cents. $4 00 Yearly. 13 Weeks $1 00.

Alas, Sherman!

Ateeo the men whom the nation delighted (and still delights) to honor was and is Gen. Sherman, the brilliant Marshal of the calm, inflexible and trenchant Grant—whose wide generosity has always overflowed towards his subordinates, and is as grand as his own subordination to the lawful authorities of the country is conspicuous. As Lieutenant-General of the armies of the United States, he held parliamentary intercourse with the General commanding the forces of the rebellion, but he did so in the purest military sense. He never undertook to compromise the nation. He frankly told the chief in arms of the most gigantic Treason the world ever saw, that he had no office beyond that of soldier in the field. He undertook no adjustment of questions outside of the soldier's province. He said in words that will live among the most memorable in History, when proposing terms of capitulation to Lee, "I regard it as my duty to shift from myself the responsibility of any further effusion of blood, by asking you to surrender." He revolved within his own sphere. He did precisely what was within his duty and authority to do. He did not undertake to dictate, even by implication, the policy of the country, but told the subtle rebel commander, who vainly sought to entrap his liberal and generous spirit, by making the surrender of his army the condition of amnesty to traitors, that "the terms upon which peace could be had were well understood," and these were "by laying down their arms" and submitting to the authority of the nation. Mark: the first General of the United States was then dealing with the first General of the rebellion; in a military sense these were the two pre-eminent men in this terrible conflict. Grant acted purely within his line of duty and scope of power.

But what happens now? A Lieutenant subordinate, a brilliant and justly successful General within his range of duty, but who had nothing more to do with the planning of the great campaign that has terminated successfully than dozens of others, has undertaken to settle all the great questions to which that struggle has given rise. Neither Heaven or earth ever witnessed a presumption equal to this! What authority or right had Johnston, the wretched, hundred-times beaten Johnston, who had not a single soldier ready or willing to use arms in support of a fallen cause, and who himself could not count upon a dozen followers to help save him from a well halter—what right had he to potter about terms, and what the executive authorities of the nation should do with doubly-dyed traitors like himself, or duebly-damned traitors like Davis, and Toombs, and Stephens?—yes, Stephens, who not only knew better, but acknowledged his own inconsistency and perfidy, even when the oath to treason quivered on his coward lips!

"How have the mighty fallen!" How today stands the gallant soldier, the brilliant marshal? In an attitude of absolute antagonism to the President and the Nation, to check whose absurd arrogance the great and good, but as yet not fully appreciated Grant has been sent to direct the army in North Carolina!

What would this man, whose brow is circled with a halo as bright as that which rests at noonday on earth's grandest domes—what would this Son of the Morning have done? He would have restored to citizenship, to position in public affairs, to the fidelity of again plunging the nation into civil war, the red-handed villains who for four years have wrung the very vitals of our nationality, who have draped every fireside—humble or banghty—with black, who have given to our enemies arrogance, to our friends humiliation, and who are more ready to re-enact treason than before to repudiate allegiance!

Gen. Sherman, when he entered into correspondence with the fugitive Johnston, deluded himself in supposing that he could direct or even indicate the policy of the nation At the very moment when his hitherto potential soldier hands meekly dropped the sword, and "prayed" or sought to give, immunity to crime, the inscrutable God placed a higher power in the hands of Andrew Johnson of Tennessee—and the hebest went forth from him and those who are his advisers, with no preliminary hesitating discussion to weaken its significance, "resume hostilities immediately!" Words Fire spoken!

This war has been no farce, but a dreadful reality, in which not alone our own interests were involved, but the rights of mankind constituted like ourselves, with less of education, perhaps, but with sympathies and hopes the same. Gen. Sherman would have ignored the whole sectional object and value of this war, by condoning treason! Toombs, under the promises of this most preposterous "basis slave-rule under the shadow of Bunker Hill! Davis might again hope to hold his arm across on the meek devotees of Liberty in the South, and Brooks again return to paralyse by blows the tongues that could not be silenced in honest debate!

The Nation mourns its martyr President. It will also mourn the suicide of one of its most brilliant, successful and honored Generals! Deus vult! It is the will of God!

PROSPECTUS

A NEW FAMILY NEWSPAPER

Under this title there will be issued from this office a Weekly Family Newspaper, the first number of which will be published on Tuesday, the 16th of May. THE CHIMNEY CORNER will have always a continuous tale of a superior and unexceptionable order. It opens with a story from one of the most popular authors of the day, which cannot fail to interest with every succeeding chapter, and which is sure to enchain the attention of the reader. Each number will also have a variety of shorter stories from our best American writers, Sketches of Travel and of Society, Anecdotes of Natural History, Biography, Poetry, Agricultural and Horticultural Suggestions and Illustrations, Receipts, Family Medical Prescriptions, Notes and Queries, Parlor Pastimes, Merry Thoughts, Comic Pictures, Portraits and Illustrations, in the best style of Art, and all of the departments to which the paper is dedicated.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER starts with a select corps of upwards of two hundred contributors, and has a complete editorial staff of established ability and large experience. It starts assured of success, and of gathering together a circle of readers that will widen daily, and to which it will prove an instructor and an entertaining friend and guest.

In addition to these literary attractions THE CHIMNEY CORNER will be the most elaborately illustrated Family Paper ever published, every number containing original stories, with beautiful designs, made expressly for them by the first artists, besides pictures of Natural History, Science, Adventure, Sports and Pastimes, &c., and a series of Comic Cuts, thus making it the most entertaining and instructive Family Paper in America.

Every Number will also contain a most striking and correct portrait, exquisitely engraved, with an original biography of some eminent person, who has risen by his own exertions to a distinguished position in our Great Republic. This series will be termed

"The Self-Made Men of our Times."

With Numbers 1 and 3 of THE CHIMNEY CORNER will be presented, gratuitously, a magnificent plate, entitled

Grand Reception of the Notabilities of the Nation at the White House, 1865.

The picture contains nearly 100 portraits of our most celebrated Generals, Statesmen and Civilians, also of many of our most distinguished American ladies. The likenesses are admirable, having been taken from photographs by Brady.

This is the most costly gift plate ever presented by any publisher in the United States, having been purchased at a cost of $10,000.

Every family should possess this truly national picture, and carefully preserve it, as it will transmit to future generations the men who have restored our great national unity. It is especially valuable, also, as containing excellent likenesses of late lamented President, introducing General Grant and his wife to Mrs. Lincoln. This costly plate is the first of a series which it is our intention to present to our regular subscribers.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER will be issued every Tuesday in New York.

It is a large-sized, and back numbers can be had by ordering the same of any News Agent.

Special Notice.

In consequence of the accidental breaking down of two of our presses, we are reluctantly compelled to forgo our design of issuing a supplement with part of the paper this week. The immense amount of interesting material collected in Washington by our various special artists, just after the President's death, will be introduced to our readers as fast as we can make room for it.

Miss Braddon's exciting story, "Only a Clod," has been cronicled out by the accumulation of absorbing matter incident to the assassination. It will be resumed next week.

Notoriety not Reputation.

No people in the world so confound vulgar notoriety with honorable reputation, or rather are so willing to accept the former for the latter, as our own. To have his name in all mouths, to have it printed often, and to see it stare out from handbills, or from the bedaubed backs by the sides of railways, is the highest ambition of the average American. It is not of much consequence in what connection his patronymic is used or appears. He will go a good deal further for the first ticket in a concert; he likes to be mentioned often as the "gentlemanly proprietor of the Highflyer Hotel," and derives great satisfaction from being pointed at as the man who made a million out of shoddy, than from the enjoyment of that sum. He don't object to being mixed up in a love suit, in case it is one that is likely to be extensively reported in the daily papers. He is eternally on hand at public meetings; never permits his name to be left off a committee, whatever its purposes, and is always on the balcony when Gen. George Napoleon Johnson is unexpectedly called out by the sweet voices of the serenading assemblage of a dozen (paid) denizens of Mackerelville.

It is not, however, in its more absurd and vain-glorious forms that we so much object to this weakness of the average American, in the matter of notoriety. If it only will ventilate themselves as such, and cease insist on writing themselves down asses, we have no fear that we feel humiliated in our national character by the proceeding. But the ambition of notoriety often goes further, and the fool is hero-worshipped. Opinions may honestly differed in character, not in impulse, from the wretch who murdered the President. The whole melo-dramatic form into which Booth shaped his fatal purpose shows that he was thinking as much of how he would appear in the newspapers, as of reproving any fancied tyranny, or punishing personal or national wrongs. Lower the standard of morality of the insatiable seeker after notoriety, and he becomes at once a dangerous villain. To be hung with a rope, and subjected to a public execution, to mouth Latin quotations to a crowd of silly admirers of "pale and interesting" criminals, and to figure in the illustrated newspapers, are for the ambition of crack-brained fellows like Booth, and would rather stimulate them to murder than restrain them from it. Whereas the certainty of being strangled in the presence of a surgeon and two witnesses, in a corner, with no public notice of it, ascertained that the law was carried out, would operate as a check upon the wicked ambition for "revenging Richmond," or slaying tyrants. Heroes of the "Ephesian dome" there are not to be encouraged in the 19th century.

"Fiat Justitia, Ruat Coelum!"

The replies which President Johnson has made to deputations of eminent States and other delegations are manly, direct and emphatic. That treason is the first and greatest of crimes, and must be punished accordingly, and that it is the duty of the Executive to Justice, while Mercy is his prerogative, never to be exercised against the interests and welfare of the nation; these are the two propositions which Mr. Johnson seeks to impress on the public mind, and which have constituted the principal burthen of his speeches. They can be enforced in no language more clear and forcible than his own. In reply to the address of the New York delegation he said:

"One great and good President has been stricken down by the hand of violence. Every one will agree that severe a crime, and must be punished. No one can regret more than I do the necessity which exists for punishment. I will assure in awarding to the assassin the punishment of the law. The first duty of the President is not to accept deserved punishment, what it will be often his duty to do, but to maintain the action of the republic—when compassed the lives of the people of the United States. It will be his duty, the possibility of ever being enforced that treason is a crime which must be punished. Yet in view of the high responsibilities which devolve upon me, I shall, if I possess the power, exercise mercy. I shall not forget, however, I trust, that with the exercise of power comes responsibility, mercy to the criminal is often a curse of the greatest misery to the mass of the people."

Again, in reply to the Ohio delegation:

"The time has come when the people shall be educated and taught to understand that treason is a crime, and not only a crime, but the highest of all crimes. * * * So far as my power is concerned, before I will consent to give up of this great country, my part to assist be taken as one with those who destroy the life of the nation's Treason must be punished as the highest crime known to the law. It must be punished because, technically speaking. Thousands and thousands have been taken from the ranks of the people as officers, sometimes by conscription, sometimes by force of public opinion, sometimes misled by leaders. I would say, in the exercise of mercy, try to make the proper discrimination, visiting the punishment of treason on the conscious, intelligent, misleading traitor, and extending leniency to the great mass of the deceived."

We are thus assured that the war has not been fought in vain, and that justice shall be meted out to traitors, while mercy shall be extended only to the deceived:

"Treason is none the less treason whether it be in a high station or in a new brick; but it does could be any different sense in such a crime, he who commits treason in a free State in a greater traitor than he who commits it in a slave state. There might be some little excuse for a man who hated the treason upon his possession of slave property; but the traitor in a free State has no excuse but simply to be a traitor. * * * Treason is a crime most odious; treason must be made odious; traitors must be punished and impoverished. Their social relations, manner, treason odious, every Union man and the country should be preserved and the penalty of death to those who have inflicted this great suffering upon the country."

Who can believe that such stuff as follows was written and printed in Charleston, South Carolina, but a few years ago than January 6th? The Secretary of that date called on "every man to strip for the fight, to prepare his rifle, and fell Sherman inch by inch, every creek a point of fight, every marsh a battle-ground." As for Charleston itself:

"We say, unhesitatingly, to those in authority, there are few persons who are prepared to make of Charleston a second Saragossa. Not to fancy ourselves in the days of Palafox, we have only to say that every house should be converted into a fortress, and every block by block in the text of old St. Michael's walls. We want no Sherman to come here with his burning torch. Every combatant in this city be compelled to leave it, and seek his fortune elsewhere in our churches and in every house in the state. Let Charleston be strictly a military camp. The opportunity is offered—let the command be given and make a fight here that will ring round the world. We will not be driven. There we are here to do it. We have made names historic before. We can do it now. Let us strip and enter the arena for life or for death."

The capitulation of Lee's army was completed at the position in which it was placed, with different troops on three sides of it, and a river on the remaining side. The "magnanimity" of Gen. Lee was shown in not sacrificing all his followers to escape, after negotiations for his surrender had been begun. In attempting to get away he ran against Sheridan at Appomattox Court-House.

The statesmanship of England, however high the position in which it is seated, is not of a kind to command sustains its sacient renown. The diplomatic correspondence of the Government of Great Britain has placed beyond the shadow that of any State country, whether in regard of style, ability, accuracy of research or force of argument. We remember of no State paper which has a finer ring than that of Earl John Russell, on the question of neutral duties and obligations, as brought up by the operations of the Alabama and other British steamers. In recklessignorance the British Secretary committed himself to the following statement:

"Her Majesty's Government are clearly of opinion that Her Majesty's Government have been far more successful in preventing the fitting out of vessels intended to cruise against the commerce of the United States than the civil war in North America has been in preventing the fitting out of ships-of-war to attack the South American commerce of the United States. Her Majesty's Government, however, then stood in the position to a certain authority having interests to protect."

Into the merits of this comparative presentment of British and United States neutrality, Mr. Adams was not required himself to be dragged just so far as was necessary to clinch Lord Russell's unfortunate reference. The Ministers rejoinder was a masterpiece of diplomatic argument. Here are his words:

"Were it expedient at this late day to enter upon an examination of the two cases, and to test the correctness of the two very widely different stages of their conducting, the difference would be found to be so decisive of neutrality under extreme issues of difficulty, that not the slightest pretext which might be carried at would have an effect in materially varying the views that should be taken of the conduct of each party. It is only necessary, I am saved the necessary of further discussion of this point, since the civil war on this continent is one which seems to have entirely escaped your attention. Whatever may be the opinion which the British Government may have formed of the merits of the struggle, it has never been made to doubt, and has not doubt, and free to use the language of neutrality in assertion of the rights of belligerents. Whenever Her Majesty's Government shall assume that the United States are unable to maintain their example may be called against the United States, but not until then."

At a meeting of citizens of Boston, on the occasion of the death of Mr. Lincoln, a number of distinguished speeches were made by leading citizens, among them Hon. A. H. Rice, M. C. We extract a few paragraphs from his able and pointed speech:

"Perhaps it was necessary that we should pass every, and that a man drawn from that section of the country which had been the theatre of the war, and which contends more immediately and ultimately the work of treason and rebellion, should be called to consummate the work he has waged, should now take the chief position in this land, and that he should be a native of one of the States of pacific and extreme war, after pleasing treason on years, and after having for years been a member of the Democratic party, and upon its platform form, trusted they were to be the platform of the Democratic party, that it would be well to wait the customary necessary to be done, and that he should be the man to say that he will not be a party to any settlement of misery-stricken North and South. He has declared that the secession must be re-born, that the leaders of the rebellion must be punished, and not a single State, not a single individual, must be restored to power with joy. We may summon to our hearts the words of the prophet of old, and with calm forgiveness, we may extend our thought to the consideration of the terms to be made by leading citizens, reconciled to the great mass of the people or the rebel States, but the leaders of this treason and blood must suffer the just penalty of their crimes. We want guilt of their blood crying to our country. We want no more of their staining treason, breeding through the land by the hands of the leaders of the people of their secret conclave; we want no more of their vices to bring poverty in our land, to bring misery to our offices of State, and we will have no more of them. We may trust that he is the man for God and for our reconciled home, and has given us the victory over blood."

Who can explain the reason for red hair? Fabulous prices are paid for carroty locks in Paris. But why auntie's locks wear lashes red hair if they choose? The Roma Lisa had red, or rather crimson, hair. Queen Elizabeth took delight in a tremendous "front" of fiery auburn. The ladies of ancient Greece affected purple hair. In this country nature has been somewhat too liberal of red hair to render it likely that it will ever be considered much of an adornment; but the American Pyrrha seems, nevertheless, determined to be as radiant in her chevelure as her French rival. The Fair One with the Golden Locks is no longer to remain the heroine of a fairy tale. We note this advertisement: "To Ladies of the Grande Monde. The fashionable diamond-and-gold powder for the hair, as used by the French Court. Sold in boxes at one dollar; or, post-free for one dollar and a quarter."

We notice that the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution have decided to rebuild those portions of the building destroyed by fire, and to make them fireproof, at a cost of $120,000, which will be paid from the surplus fund of the institution. We trust that, in carrying out this decision, they will not consider themselves called on to reproduce the wonderful design of the architect. They cannot go amiss if they disregard it. They cannot spoil their concern architecturally, and it will be easy to make it more appropriate for its purposes. It is a pity it couldn't be converted into a lunatic asylum, with its designer as head patient!

Summary of the War.

NORTH CAROLINA.

The only military event of the week has been the strange convention between Gen. Sherman and Gen. Johnston, which, of course, was immediately repudiated by President Johnson. It has, however, had the effect of allowing Jeff Davis to escape with Breckinridge, Judah Benjamin, and his rebel cabinet. As an instance of how a great soldier can prove himself a weak diplomatist, we subjoin an abstract of the abortive memorandum of agreement between the Union commander and his rebel opponent. It is dated near Durham's station, 18th April:

1st—The contending armies now in the field to maintain their statu quo until notice is given by the Commanding-General of either one to its opponent, and reasonable time—say 48 hours—allowed.

2d—The Confederate armies now in existence to be disbanded and conducted to their several State capitals; there to deposit their arms and public property in the State Arsenal, and each officer and man to execute and file an agreement to cease from acts of war and abide the action of both State and Federal authorities. The number of arms and munitions of war to be reported to the Chief of Ordnance at Washington city, subject to the future action of the Congress of the United States, and in the meantime to be used solely to maintain peace and order within the borders of the States respectively.

3d—The recognition by the Executive of the United States of the several State Governments, on their officers and Legislatures taking the oath prescribed by the Constitution of the United States; and where conflicting State Governments have resulted from the war the legitimacy of all shall be submitted to the Supreme Court of the United States.

4th—The re-establishment of all Federal courts in the several States, with powers as defined by the Constitution and laws of Congress.

5th—The people and inhabitants of all States to be guaranteed, so far as the Executive can, their political rights and franchise, as well as their rights of person and property, as defined by the Constitution of the United States and of States respectively.

6th—The executive authority of the Government of the United States not to disturb any of the people by reason of the late war so long as they live in peace and quiet, abstain from acts of armed hostility, and obey laws in existence at any place of their residence.

7th—In general terms war to cease; a general amnesty so far as the executive power of the United States can command, or on condition of disbandment of the Confederate armies, and the distribution of arms and resumption of peaceful pursuits by officers and men hitherto composing the said armies. Not being fully empowered by our respective principals to fulfil these terms we individually and officially pledge ourselves to promptly obtain necessary authority to carry out the above programme.

TOWN GOSSIP.

How does it feel to kill a man? Lord Byron's dark question recurs in connection with the late tragedy. In the soft mystery of a summer night, with the warm Mediterranean waves lapping at the vessel's sides, his lordship was seen bending over a sleeping sailor with a dagger, the beauty of his face lost in its moody deviltry. "How does it feel, I wonder, to kill a man?"

Perverse as it may be, our thoughts will wander from the good, great martyr who lies so low to his abandoned destroyer.

Murderer, have you got what you played for? Does that feeling of self-satisfaction and confidence inspire you now which you intended should follow upon the act? The fame of the man who killed Lincoln, of Illinois, was to have been greater than that of Washington, and you are that man. Do you truly feel Washington at your side to-day?

On the Friday night Booth paused a moment upon the stage, and surveyed and addressed his audience. His deed had been neatly and perfectly done. There had been no hitch, no balk, the heroic act had just taken place, and the tragedian felt himself playing the most successful rôle of his life, with the whole country for his theatre. The intense vanity and sense of importance in the man overcame for a moment even his thought of personal danger, and he flung some words to the bewildered and stupified spectators in the act of making his escape. At that moment he must have felt himself indeed at the side of Washington. Lincoln was dying. The South was avenged. His own prospect of a place in the history of his country seemed brilliant. The details of flight and capture were confused and overborne by the great consciousness that before the eyes of all the world he had done what he came to do, and done it well.

But how soon must have occurred the revulsion of his childish dream. Lincoln dead, the Presidency, which can never die, instantly put on another and more menacing shape. Without the least noise or disarrangement in the machinery of state, or the slightest demur or disaffection in the assemblies of the people, the representative authority formed again like the flesh of Milton's immortals who could not be slain. For the murderer's anticipation of approval from the country, and a bright niche in the edifice of fame, are exchanged this world-wide and soul-crushing obloquy. The perpetrator, with his assassin's figure in black relief against the whole race of mankind, who seem spotless by contrast, flies hither and thither, rejected by earth and heaven. And what he has done for his "friends," is, that he has given them a President whose little finger will be heavier upon them than were the loins of Abraham. Thus l'homme propose.

New York city during the week past has given itself up to a sincere expression of sorrow. From that terrible Saturday, long to be remembered, when the dark news of the murder stole over the city with the dawn, up to the still sadder time when the remains of the good President lay within our gates, every face has been darkened, and every building, public and private, hung with the sorrowful draperies of death. For long years hence, the black week following the black deed will be the theme of fireside conversation and whispered reminiscences worse than ghost-stories.

An almost morbid display of ingenuity has been made by the proprietors of various public buildings up and down our streets, in varying to the utmost possible extent the funeral devices hung over their fronts. Every caprice of sorrow was exhibited. The fabrics of mourning, relieved—rather too copiously, perhaps—with decorations of white, were hung or laced up and down the façades in every form of apron, fillet and baldric. Meanwhile the city was taking its sad holiday; business of every sort was suspended; the long and weary procession of citizens passed from morning till midnight aimless and confounded, between these darkly-clothed walls—their own garments bearing, in most instances, the token of grief. It was a positive relief to this sullen and unmitigated grief when the day previously fixed for Thanksgiving, but changed in the urgency of the occasion to a time of fasting and prayer, arrived and opened the churches; the people felt as they never felt before the need of religious consolation in that first week of orphanage.

The dreadful holiday filled all the streets with joyless crowds. Most were dressed in dark colors, and a large majority wore some badge of mourning, those not so marked being in a decided minority. For once church-going was absolutely popular. People knew not what else to do. We attended about noon at Trinity. The sombre magnificence of the interior was heightened by heavy hangings of black, and a large congregation was listening with sorrowful attention to a discourse from the Rev. Dr. Dix. The speaker, in a noble and catholic spirit, quite lifted above sectionalism or narrowness of any kind, arraigned the South at the bar of the world for its deeds of the past, and challenged its comment upon the assassin's work as the last chance offered it for redemption at the court of public opinion. In all the other churches the services were full, eloquent, and well attended, the congregations who had looked forward to an occasion of triumphant thanksgiving deriving real comfort from the language of intercession and supplication.

The theatres have not forgotten that a theatre was the scene of one of the most disgraceful murders in history. They vied with each other in exhibiting before their closed doors the most appropriate mottoes and devices. Wallack's Theatre was peculiarly successful in this sad heraldry. Among a profusion of hatchments and draperies was exhibited a portrait of the late President, while beneath the effigy hung a broad banner displaying those immortal words by Shakespeare:

> "He hath borne his faculties so meek; hath been
> So clear in his great office, that his virtues
> Will plead like angels, trumpet-tongued, against
> The deep damnation of his taking off!
> And Pity, like a naked newborn babe
> Riding the blast, or heaven's cherubim, horsed
> Upon the wingless couriers of the air,
> Shall blow the horrid deed in every eye,
> That tears shall drown the wind!"

Among theatrical people we have a very general and sincere condemnation of the villainous deed. The greatest sympathy and commiseration was felt for that stainless gentleman and loyalist, Mr. Edwin Booth, whose grief under this heavy family blow must be of the most complicated and distressing character. It is quite time now to explode the silly old oriental and pagan notion that a man's reputation or status is to suffer because some relative of his chooses to disgrace himself. Whoever thought the worse of Seth because Cain chose to commit the first murder? In this century, at any rate, let it be to ourselves that we stand or fall. As we claim no vantage ground for the virtues and prestige of our ancestors, so let us lose nothing by the freaks of our relations, who prefer to earn the reputation of criminals.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—When Richmond gazes upon the old familiar flag that is floating over her, she must fancy that she has been under the influence of a horrid nightmare for the last four years.

—— The citizens of Richmond will now behold an unaccustomed sight. They may not admire the spectacle of the blue coats, but they will certainly rejoice in the appearance of the greenbacks.

—— The Richmond papers are stopped. The world's stock of impudence and insolence is reduced one-half.

—— The Philadelphia Press has the following: Passing along one of our streets in which the lowest sort of wares are sold at the lowest prices to the lowest classes, we looked into a store—a dark, dirty, begrimed den, filled with rags and scraps of iron—in fact, a sort of receptacle of decayed refuse of every kind, and through the smoky panes of the window we read these significant words—"Cash paid for Confederate bonds"—in other words, here was a good market for the rags with which Jefferson Davis has been trying to cover the hideous nakedness of the rebellion."

—— "How long will it take me to go to Richmond?" asked an eager officer at City Point, of a veteran brigadier holding command there, soon after we got the good news. "I can't say how long it will take you," was the answer, "it has taken me three years and eleven months."

—— Gen. Grant gave a version of the battles near Petersburg, and Gen. Lee a perversion.

—— The rebels drag negroes from their beds at midnight in their recruiting expeditions. Pompey can't sleep on Pompey's Pillow.

—— The loss by the late floods in different parts of the State of Pennsylvania is estimated by engineers, architects and agriculturists as fully reaching $10,000,000.

—— A retired actor, with a fondness for poultry, was asked why he named a favorite hen Macduff. He replied that it was because he wanted her to lay on.

—— A correspondent of the San Francisco Bulletin gives his experience about obtaining petroleum from asphaltum. After spending about $5,000 and ruining all his clothes, he abandoned the project in disgust. He mentions several others, prominent men in San Francisco, who are convinced that illuminating oil cannot be obtained from that article more than from water.

—— The Federal military authorities have drawn a black line around Savannah. It is encircled by 5,000 negro troops.

—— The rebels lately submitted propositions to the Federal Government. Now let them submit themselves to it.

—— The rebel Government ought to be arrested, tried by a justice of the peace, and sent to the workhouse upon the charge of having no visible means of support, says the Louisville Journal.

—— The dry dock formerly in use at New Orleans was converted by the rebels into a ram war steamer. It has just been replaced by another from Madison, Indiana, which arrived at New Orleans in tow, on the 17th ult., with an enormous cargo of 1,100 tons of hay.

—— It is not known whether the sword which Gen. Lee formally surrendered to Gen. Grant was presented to him by his admirers, purchased with his own money, or furnished by the U. S. Government before the rebellion. Those who ask questions should be patient, for Jenkins will surely soon enlighten them on the subject.

—— Mr. Choate once began a political speech at Faneuil Hall by saying: "Mr. Chairman, you called on me last evening to invite me to speak to the Whigs of Boston to-night. I told you that under no circumstances could I be present, and accordingly here I am!" This humorous non sequitur seems to have been followed by Gen. Lee in his surrender to Grant. He says practically—"I entirely disagree with you, Gen. Grant, about the desperateness of my situation, and accordingly I give in."

—— The British residents of this city held a meeting at the Astor House on the 18th of April, to express their sympathy with the American nation in the assassination of President Lincoln. Mr. Archibald was in the chair. The resolutions passed were very appropriate.

—— The Philadelphia papers have published a long letter written by Booth, the assassin, in Nov., 1864, from which it appears that he then meditated the abduction of the President. He also in it glorifies in the fact that he was one of the party engaged in the capture and execution of Ossawatomie Brown.

—— The captures of rebel artillery by the National forces from Dec. 1st to this time amount to 1,655 guns, apart from those sunk or buried. The monumental column erected by the First Napoleon in the Place Vendome from the captured cannon of his sweeping Austrian campaigns is considered a grand affair; but in the presence of the column which these last four months' captures of Gen. Grant would make Napoleon's monument dwindle down to the pitiful proportions of a Lombardy poplar under the shadow of one of those gigantic cloud-kissing cedars of California.

—— Sharon Tyndale, Secretary of State of Illinois, announces from Springfield, that: "A National Monument Fund is on foot, and a plot of ground, six acres, in the heart of the city, selected for the burial-place of our lamented President Lincoln."

—— Three rebel armies have surrendered to Gen. Grant—that under Buckner at Fort Donelson, on the 16th of Feb., 1862; that under Pemberton at Vicksburg, on the 4th of July, 1863; and that under Gen. Lee, on the 9th of April, 1865. He is the only one of our Generals who has ever induced a rebel army to surrender, and he has induced three of them.

—— Fitz Greene Halleck, the poet, is in New York. The Evening Post says he is as cheery as he was 30 years ago.

—— Deserters are hired by the farmers of Maryland, Pennsylvania and the more distant States, at prices ranging from $8 to $10 a month, Government paying their fare to where they desire to go.

—— The stability of the Government, even on the day when the nation was mourning the assassination of its head, is significantly indicated by the fact that the subscriptions to the 7-30 loan on the day following the assassination were over $3,700,000.

—— It is reported that Gen. Lee has expressed an intention to leave Richmond and reside on Mr. Hid Carber's farm near City Point. He proposes, it is said, neither to go to the South or to Richmond.

—— Samuel Arnold is the name of the Baltimore gentleman who was arrested as the associate of Wilkes Booth and his correspondent "Sam." He acknowledges, it is said, that there was a plot to kidnap Mr. Lincoln, but says he declined to participate in the matter.

—— The following resolution was offered by Andrew Johnson in the House of Representatives, March 13, 1848: "That rotation in office, in the opinion of this House, is one of the cardinal tenets in a Republican form of Government, and ought never to be violated, on any pretence whatever, and should be practised upon by all Administrations, regardless of their party names."

Naval.—There are now 2,600 men employed at the Portsmouth Navy Yard, and quite a fleet is getting ready for sea. The Agamenticus, double turreted monitor, is nearly ready for her trial trip, and it is expected she will soon be ordered to Europe.

Accidents and Offences.—Lieut. Cantrell, U. S. A., was accidentally shot at Fort Richmond, Staten Island, on Tuesday, April 18th. He died soon afterwards.

Personal.—The elder Booth's habits were exceedingly irregular, and so interfered with his performances at times, that an actor less gifted would have forfeited his popularity beyond redemption. It was rarely that he appeared sober on the stage, and towards the close of his life, it required all the vigilance and art of managers to keep him in a condition to appear on the stage at all. The stories told of him in this connection are innumerable, and some of them extremely ludicrous. His appetite for liquor was absolutely voracious. Being without money at one time when in New York, he went to a pawnbroker's shop, literally pawned himself for money to purchase liquor, was regularly ticketed, and exhibited in a window, where he stayed till "redeemed" by a friend. On another occasion, being announced to appear in Philadelphia—at the Walnut street theatre—the manager, on the day for the performance, had Booth locked up, but was outwitted by the actor, who bribed the servant to bring a bottle of brandy, a saucer and a clay pipe. Inserting the pipe through the keyhole, with the bowl inverted, the brandy was poured into the saucer, and sucked up through the pipe by the thirsty tragedian, and the fact was disclosed when in the twilight the manager proceeded there to conduct him to the dressing-room, and found him in an insensible condition.

—— Hon. Roscoe Conklin, of Utica, has been appointed special Judge Advocate for the Western Military Division of the State.

—— Gen. Washburne has tendered his resignation to Gen. Thomas, to take effect May 1st. The reason he assigns is that he considers the war is over.

—— Gen. R. E. Lee arrived in Richmond on the 15th April, and proceeded to his residence in Franklin street.

—— Senator Foster, the new Vice-President, was born in Franklin, New London county, Conn., Nov. 22, 1806, and is a direct descendant of Miles Standish. He has been a member of the General Assembly of Connecticut, Speaker of the House, Mayor of Norwich, and United States Senator elected in 1855 and re-elected in 1860.

Obituary.—Mr. Alexander Heron, a highly respected merchant of Philadelphia, died suddenly in that city on the 14th April. He was a brother of the celebrated actress, Matilda Heron.

—— John Cassell, the well-known English publisher, died in London on the 2d April, aged 48. He had, from a very obscure position and mechanical trade of a carpenter, raised himself to a position of usefulness, wealth and reputation. His Cassell's Journal is one of the most popular journals in England, and enjoys a large sale on this continent. His latest undertaking was an edition of Doré's Don Quixote.

—— Richard Cobden, the famous Corn Law Reformer and the staunch friend of the United States, died in London on the 2d April, aged 61. He visited America twice—once in 1835 and again in 1862.

Foreign.—Louis Napoleon has shaved off his imperial. The French people should shave off all that's imperial about him.

—— The Paris Charivari has a picture of a pair of horses shying at the entrance to an hotel in which a horseflesh banquet was recently given.

—— A begging letter addressed to the Emperor Napoleon began: "Sire, I received under your late uncle two mortal wounds—one at Wagram, the other in the leg."

—— The Emperor of Austria, having for a long while been behindhand in his finances, tries occasionally to improve them by means of lotteries. He has lately authorised a banker at Frankfort-on-the-Main to open subscriptions for a new loan on this attractive plan.

—— In Ceylon the marriage ceremony is performed by tying the couple together by the thumbs. In this country they are more frequently put together by the ears.

—— A merchant in Prague wrote the other day to another: "My dear sir—The only paying business now-a-days is to fail in business and not to pay your debts. I am very sorry that I am ten years too old to do this, and therefore am compelled to pay you."

—— The London Athenæum informs us that "some injudicious friends" of Capt. Maury (late Lieut. Maury of the U. S. Observatory, Washington, who deserted his post to join the rebels), are proposing to raise a fund in England by public appeal for purchasing an estate for him. It remarks: "Surely such a movement would be a great mistake. To Capt. Maury's scientific merits no one will accuse the Athenæum of being indifferent; but is this the time for a demonstration which his own countrymen will regard as political? We cannot think so. Capt. Maury is something larger than a mere partisan of either side in a civil conflict; a man too great to be used as a pretext for a small Confederate exhibition. He belongs to science. In some sense he belongs to all the world. It is not for his interest, and certainly not for the honor of science, that his name should now be paraded in subscription lists by a dozen Alabama-builders and blockade-runners, even though supported by such Confederate sympathisers as Lord Lothian and Sir Henry De Hoghton. At this moment such a testimonial could only be understood in America as another hostile demonstration."

—— The Portuguese Government have published an official account of the Stonewall affair. It is asserted that the commander of the Union vessels might have avoided all difficulty by sending previous notice to the Governor of Belem Tower.

—— The Federal Diet of Germany, on April 6, passed the important resolution to request Austria and Prussia to cede Holstein to the Duke of Augustenburg. Austria declared her willingness to conform with this resolution, but Prussia declared herself unable to do so.

—— The Emperor Napoleon had decided that a marble bust of Cobden should be placed in the museum at Marseilles. All the papers of Paris and several speakers in the Legislative Assembly paid a high tribute to Cobden.

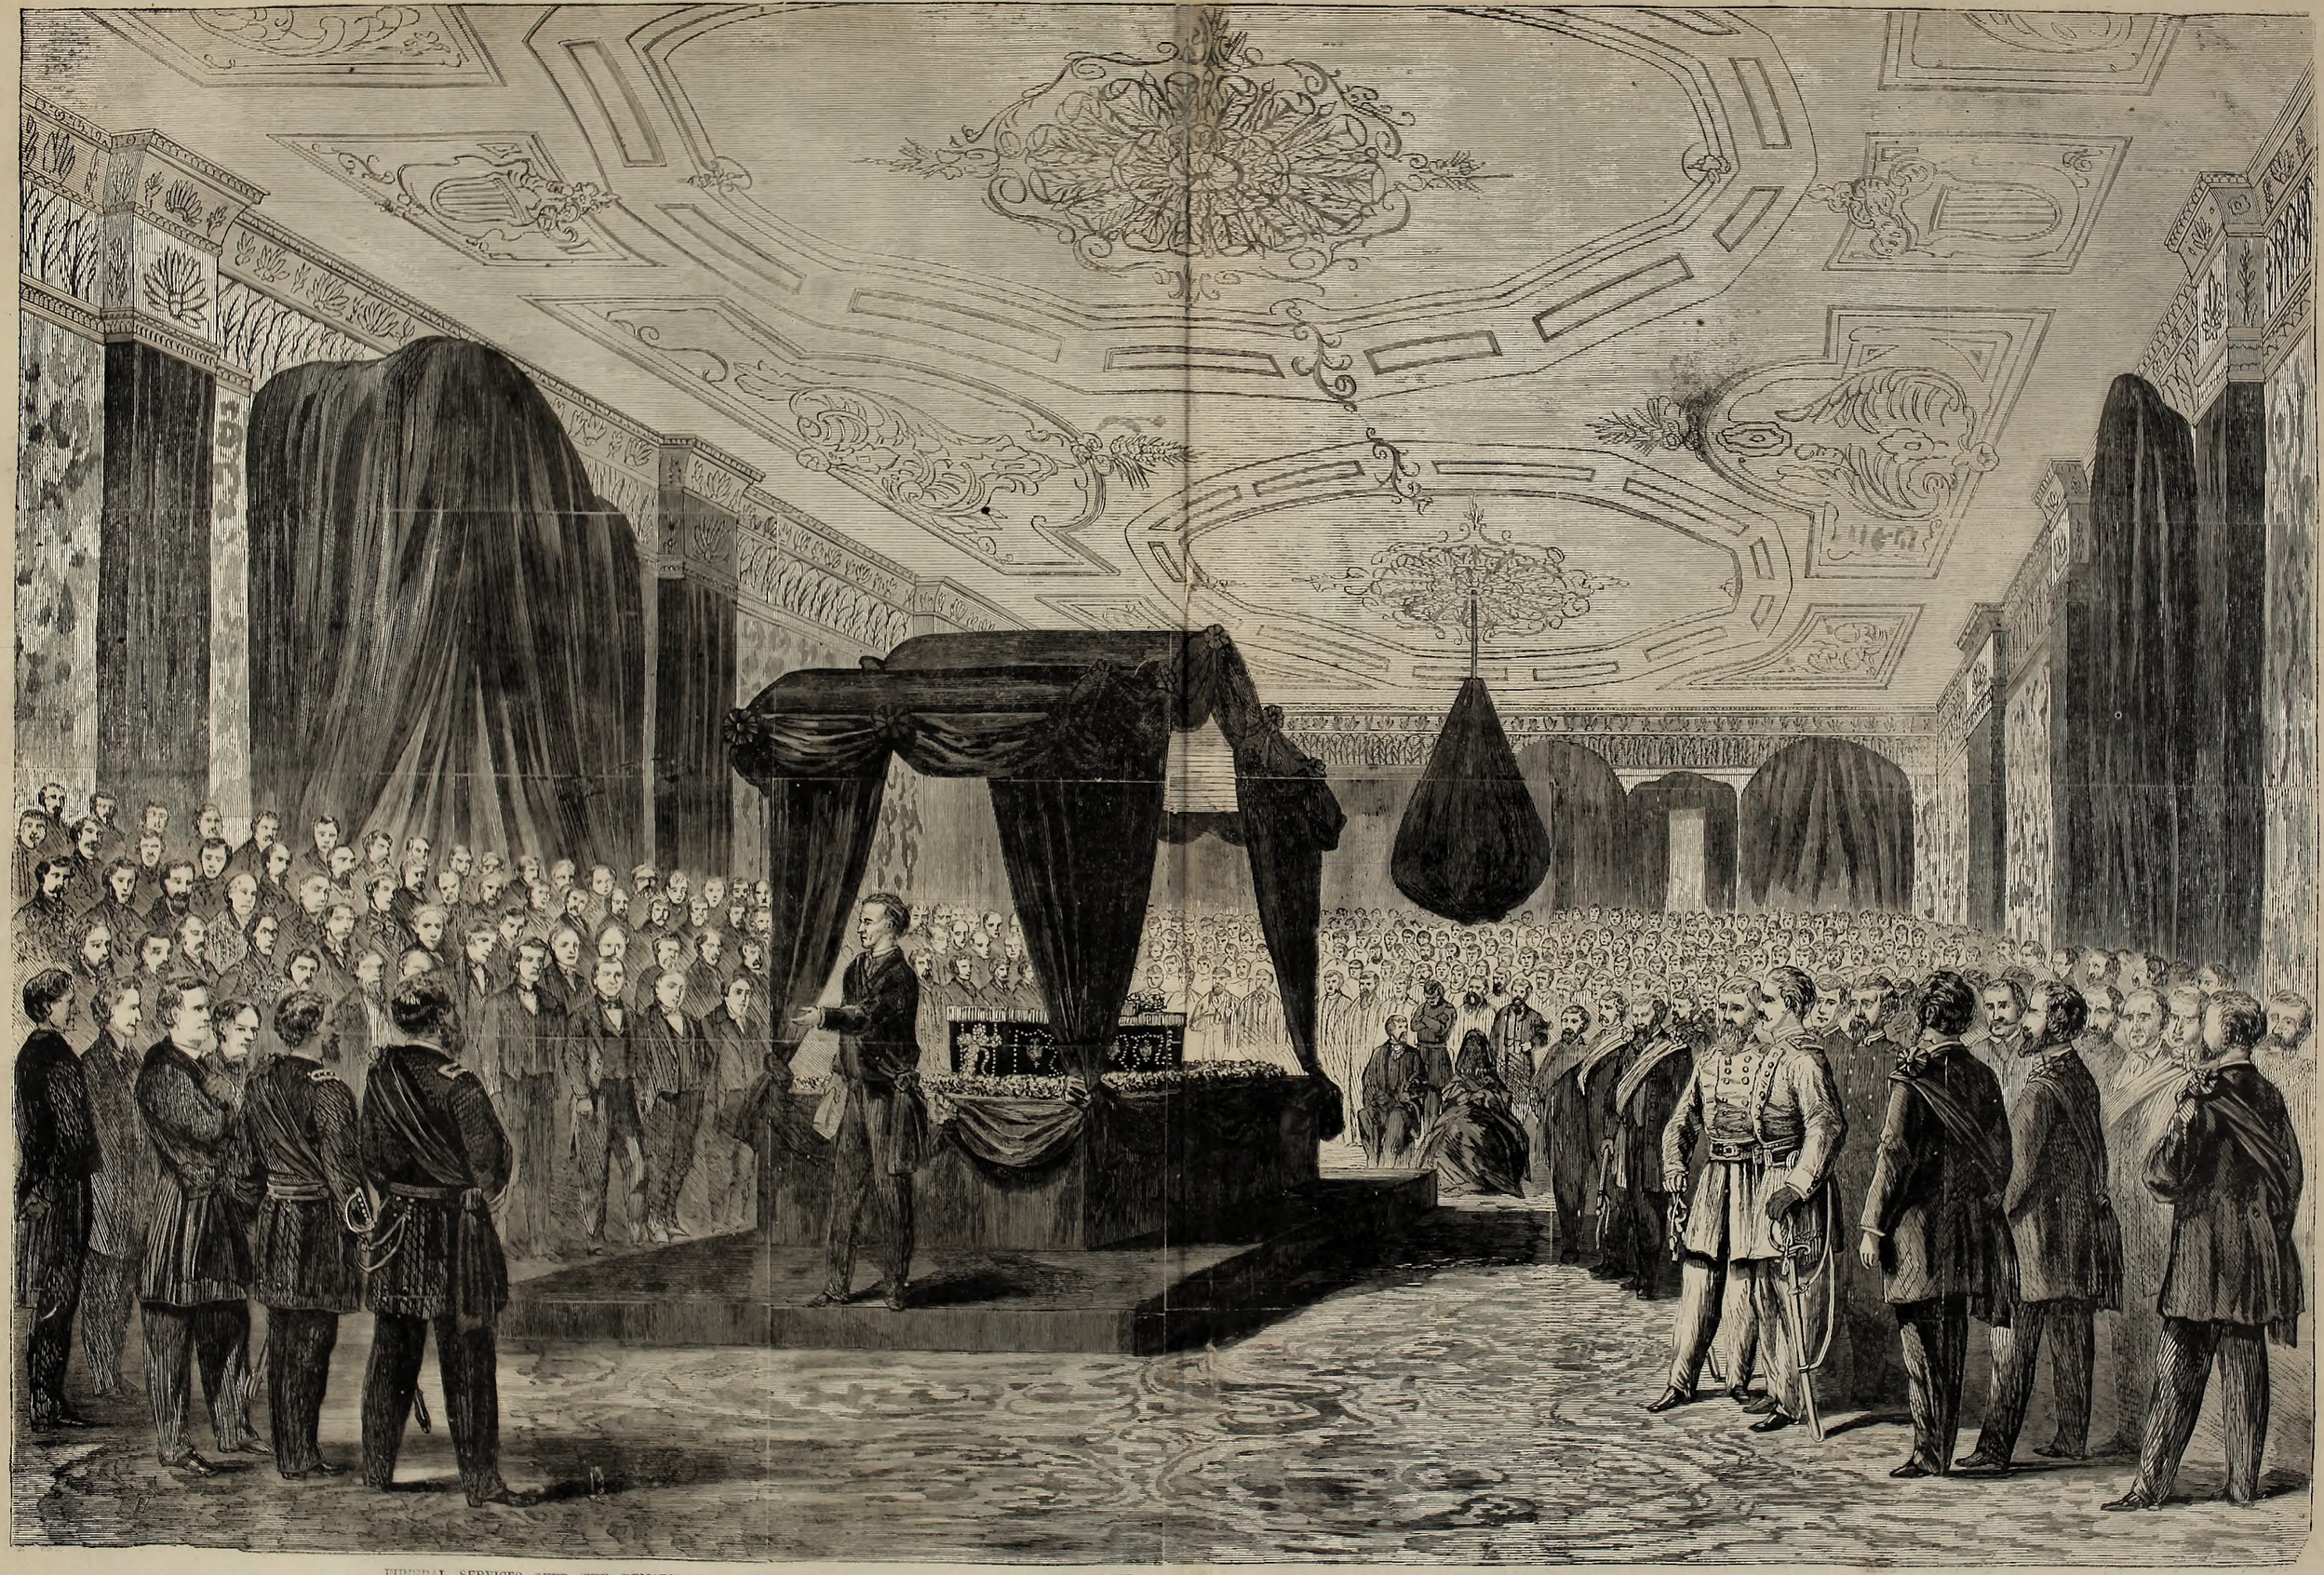
—— The plague still continues at St. Petersburg. The total number of cases thus far is 10,000, and the deaths 2,000.

—— A motion in the Belgian Chamber of Representatives, expressing regret that the Government had not absolutely refrained from taking part in the Mexican expedition, was lost by a vote of 55 to 57.

—— Cobden's funeral took place on the 9th of April. It was largely attended by the most eminent men of Great Britain. Several distinguished Frenchmen were present, who had come from Paris.

—— An epidemic resembling in its fatality the Asiatic cholera, has for some months devastated the interior of Russia. Apparently taking its origin in Siberia, it has gradually swept down southward, spreading more widely on either side as it advances. As yet it has completely baffled the skill of the Russian physicians, and of those professors of medicine who have proceeded from Germany to study its symptoms. In many respects this epidemic resembles the celebrated plague of Athens, which decimated Attica in the second and third years of the Peloponnesian war. Like it, the epidemic belongs to the class of eruptive typhoid disorders. The person seized immediately despairs of recovery; he loses memory and hope together. Like it, too, the Siberian fever is accompanied generally by a hoarse cough and violent retching, and the victim seldom survives beyond the ninth day. The total number of cases has reached 10,000, of deaths 2,000, and the average number of cases is 100 a day. No less than 40 physicians are reported dead, though whether they have fallen victims to the disease is not stated.

—— In a recent number of Charivari, John Bull is represented in an attitude of abject terror, leaning against a post inscribed "Canada," and staring in affright at a burly Yankee malefactor who is throttling a man on the ground. "When he is done with him, he'll come and rob me!" is the despairing cry of the helpless, fat and timid victim.



Art, Science and Literature.—Mr. Glaisher has communicated to the British Meteorological Society a paper on the secular increase of mean temperature, including various records of observations and tables, from which he derives the following remarkable results, and which he states he has tested in various methods in order to prove their accuracy: 1.—That our climate in the last hundred years has altered; 2.—That the temperature of the year is two degrees warmer now than it was then; 3.—That the month of January is three degrees warmer; and 4.—That the winter months are all much warmer, and every month in the year seems to be somewhat warmer than before." He considers that the effect will be to influence agricultural produce and cause the introduction of new fruits. He hopes that the series of observations now in progress all over the world will be patiently continued, in order to ascertain whether any part of the world has become two degrees colder in its mean annual temperature in the last one hundred years, or the world itself has increased generally two degrees in warmth.

—— Mr. George Busk, F. R. S., at a recent meeting of the Geological Society of London, communicated a letter which had been addressed by himself and the late Dr. Falconer to the Governor of Gibraltar, containing the results of their examination of the Genista Cave, one of the numerous caverns in which the rock of Gibraltar abounds. This cave has been traced to a depth of 200 feet, but the external aperture has not yet been discovered. It was stated to be full of the remains of quadrupeds and birds; some of the former being wholly extinct; others extinct in Europe, and repelled to distant regions of Africa; while others live again either on the rock or on the Spanish peninsula. A list of the species was given, and it was inferred that there had been a connection between Europe and Africa at no very distant geological period, and that the wild animals lived upon the rock during a long series of ages. The authors strongly recommend the formation of a local collection of the specimens and the appointment of a geologist to make a survey of the rock.

—— Capt. Schultze, of the Prussian artillery, has recently patented a new kind of gunpowder, which possesses some remarkable peculiarities. It consists principally of wood reduced by a very ingenious process to very minute cylinders of grains, deprived of all their constituents other than cellulose, and steeped in a solution of nitrate of potash and nitrate of barytes. The explosive effect of this new powder is stated to be as great as that of gun cotton, while it does not possess the great disadvantages of the latter substance.

—— Vegetable flannel is now largely manufactured in Germany from the Pinus silvestris, or Scotch fir. A great number of persons are employed in the various processes of separating the fibre from the oil. The fibre, locally called wold-wold, is spun, knitted and woven into various fabrics. It is said to be highly efficacious in restoring the functions of the skin to its normal condition.

—— A method has been recently suggested for softening the effect of photographic pictures, and removing the too faithful harshness with which they render some faces; or, in other words, of introducing a little flattery into photographic portraits. According to the Photographic News, M. Mathey suggests the following method: "The plan is to have a laced curtain stretched on a wooden frame, placed between the camera and the sitter; the farther the curtain is from the model, and consequently the nearer it is to the lens, the softer the features appear: the threads of the lace give the grain of a chalk drawing or engraving, and the defects of the model are modified and softened down."

FUNERAL SERVICES OVER THE REMAINS OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN, AS THEY LAY IN STATE IN THE EAST ROOM OF THE WHITE HOUSE, APRIL 19.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, C. E. H. BONWILL.

How Nature Covers up Battlefields.—"Did I ever tell you," says a correspondent of an Eastern paper, "among the affecting little things one is always seeing in these battlefields, how, on the ground upon which the battle of Bull Run was fought, I saw pretty, pure, delicate flowers growing out of the empty ammunition boxes, and a wild rose thrusting up its graceful head through the top of a broken drum, which doubtless sounded its last charge in that battle, and a cunning scarlet verbena peeping out of a fragment of a bursted shell, in which strange pot it was planted? Wasn't that peace growing out of war? Even so shall the beautiful and graceful ever grow out of the horrid and terrible things that transpire in this changing but ever advancing world. Nature covers even the battlegrounds with verdure and bloom. Peace and plenty spring up in the track of the devouring campaign, and all things in nature and society shall work out the progress of mankind."

A plain old clergymen was once applied to by a young man for advice on a very important matter. He asked which of two sisters he had best pay his addresses to. One was very lovely in her disposition, but not a professor of religion. The other was a professing Christian, but very ill-tempered. "Marry the good-tempered one by all means," said the old gentleman. "The Spirit of God can live where you can't."

Who was the fastest woman mentioned in the Bible?

Herodias; when she got ahead of John the Baptist on a charger.

Read! Read!!

The spirit of Nationality which has fired the American heart ever since the rebellion sought the overthrow of our country's prosperity has been productive of many changes—many new inventions.

THE UNION CARDS

have already revolutionized the card trade, and still the work is only commenced. So great has been the demand for these Cards that the Company has scarcely been able to supply one grade, without attempting the manufacture of other qualities. By the increased facilities which have been added, through great expense, they are now prepared to fill all orders on the day received, and the cordial co-operation of all who love the Eagle, Shield, Stars and Flag of the Union is respectfully invited.

Of how much more significance are our National Emblems than the homely, meaningless characters used to designate the suits in the old style of cards. Kings, Queens and Jacks are played out! Clubs and Spades no more!!

Colonels remove Kings; the Goddess of Liberty scorns Queens; and the Major is high to any Jack in Christendom. In order to secure your interest in the general circulation of the UNION CARDS, the following prices have been established, at which you will be supplied:

U. S. 7-30 LOAN.

By authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, the undersigned has assumed the General Subscription Agency for the sale of United States Treasury Notes, bearing seven and three tenths per cent. interest per annum, known as the Seven-Thirty Loan.

These Notes are issued under date of June 15th, 1865, and are payable three years from that time, in currency, or are convertible at the option of the holder into

U. S. 5-20 Six per cent.
GOLD-BEARING BONDS.

These bonds are worth a premium which increases the actual profit on the 7-30 loan, and its exemption from State and municipal taxation adds from one to three per cent. more, according to the rate levied on other property. The interest is payable in currency semi-annually by coupons attached to each note, which may be cut off and sold to any bank or banker.

The interest amounts to

One cent per day on a				$50 note.

Ten	"	"	"	$500	"
20	"	"	"	$1,000	"
$1	"	"	"	$5,000	"

Notes of all the denominations named will be promptly furnished upon receipt of subscriptions, and the notes forwarded at once. The interest to 15th June next will be paid in advance. This is now offered by the Government, and it is confidently expected that its superior advantages will make it the Great Popular Loan of the People.

THE ONLY LOAN IN MARKET

Less than $300,000,000 of the Loan authorized by the last Congress are now on the market. This amount, at the rate at which it is being absorbed, will all be subscribed for within four months, when the notes will undoubtedly command a premium, as has uniformly been the case on closing the subscriptions to other Loans.

In order that citizens of every town and section of the country may be afforded facilities for taking the loan, the National Banks, State Banks, and Private Bankers throughout the country have generally agreed to receive subscriptions at par. Subscribers will select their own agents, in whom they have confidence, and who only are to be responsible for the delivery of the notes for which they receive orders.

ARRANDALE & CO., Manufacturers' Agents,
No. 197 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
Announce that they have purchased the entire stock of the One Dollar sale.
It is conscious of the great stagnation of trade in the manufacturing districts of England, through the war in this country, that has induced the late firm of Arrandale Jewellery, originally intended for the English market, to dispose of their stock, which, fortunately, MUST BE SOLD AT ANY SACRIFICE!
Under these circumstances ARRANDALE & CO., act as Agents for the principal European Manufacturers, and have effected a great saving to their customers, by the following regulations:
Each and every one of the various articles are first put into envelopes, sealed up and mixed; and when ordered, are promiscuously taken out, without regard to quality, and then put up for sale.
On receipt of One Dollar, you will see what you will get, and if you do not like your bargain, you can return the dollar and has the article sent. Purchasers may have as many Certificates as they please, at any Set of Jewellery on our list for ONE DOLLAR.
Send 25 Cents for Certificate.
In all transactions by mail, please arrange for forwarding 25 Certificates, paying postage and doing the business. Do not send for less than 25 Certificates. Certificates for less than 25 Certificates will be sent for 31 cents for 25; thirty for 50 cents; or a dollar for a hundred, by mail.
AGENTS.—We want agents in every regiment, and in every locality in the country in the loyal states, and as such will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate we send, thus giving a liberal chance to canvassers for One Dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents by every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, with 10 cents for postage Stamps.
ARRANDALE & CO.,
197 Broadway, New York.

What the "Press" say of Us.

GREAT GUN ESTABLISHMENT.—A rare opportunity is offered for obtaining watches, jewelry, sewing machines, silverware, etc., by Messrs. Arrandale & Co., at No. 197 Broadway. Their stock, originally intended for the English variety in value, and all are offered for $1 each. The plan is to sell a very large number of articles, by the certificate of a certain article, enclosed in an envelope, and are subjected to no private sale. Purchasers may be satisfied with the article, which will certainly be worth the money on account, and may obtain as many as they like, excellent mode this of investing a dollar.—Sunday Dispatch, New York, Feb. 19, 1865.

Messrs. Arrandale & Co. have long been personally known to us as gentlemen of the highest honor, and worthy of public confidence.—New York Scottish Americ. Journal, February 18, 1865.

We have inspected, at the office of Arrandale & Co.'s establishment, the various articles of jewellery to be sent to purchasers of certificates, and we are delighted to see silver pins, and understand that the whole of these worthy firm's remaining stock are to be disposed of on the principle, giving great advantages to buyers, and affording substantial encouragement to agents. We have the first in question to be a very respectable and worthy firm, and we feel sure that our readers will recommend our friends to send their advertisement.—New York Sunday Mercury, Feb. 19, 1865.

By Messrs. Arrandale & Co.'s arrangement, the adventurous purchaser has the chance of getting for $1 what he has everything to gain, and nothing comparatively to lose. Purchasers may be sure that the money will be returned, as it is need not send it if he is not satisfied.—New York Daily News, Aug. 4, 1864.

EMPLOYMENT FOR LADIES.—The most eligible and respectable employment will be found in the sale of certificates for the "Great Gift Distribution" of Arrandale & Co., a lady of our acquaintance has been very successful in this way, not only filling her own pockets with money, but also putting the time to whom she sold the Certificates, as she sent from our advertising office a number of orders.—Ladies' Journal, New York Sunday Mercury, Aug. 14, 1864.

In our columns will be found an advertisement of Arrandale & Co.'s Gift Distribution of watches, jewellery and silverware. On the part of that firm we must say we make several sets of the jewellery advised, and we are warranted in saying that, both in kind and quality, they quite exceeded our expectations. They turned out to be just what they had been represented.—True Democrat Herald, Aug. 17, 1864.

The British Whig of Kingston, C. W., says, Nov. 25, 1864, one of our lady subscribers became an agent for Arrandale & Co., and by request brought some of articles, sent as prizes for the money, to this office for inspection, and without hesitation we can state that each and all of the articles were worth treble the amount of cost to the recipients, and some of them six times.

ARCANA WATCH.

An Elegant Novelty in Watches.

The cases of this watch are an entirely new invention, composed of six different metals combined, rolled together and hammered, presenting an exact imitation of 18 carat gold, called Arcana, which will always keep its color. They are as handsome and elegant as a solid gold, and are admitted at once within the cost. The case is beautifully engraved, with Pencil and Shield for name, with Patent Push Pin, and engraved in the exact style of the celebrated Gold Hunting Cases, and are equally handsome and durable, and so exact an imitation of gold, as to defy detection. The movement is manufactured by the well known St. James Watch Company of Europe, and are equal to any in quality, superior workmanship, finely carved bridges, adjusting regulator, with gold balance, and the jewels ruby jewelled, acting with fine dial and sapphire hands, and is warranted a good timekeeper. The watch and cases are different in size, the smallest being for ladies, and are all Hunting Cases. A case of six will be sent by mail or express for $125, a single case sent as elegant Morocco Case for $25, will readily sell for three times their cost. We are the sole agents for this watch in the United States, and none are genuine which do not bear our Trade Mark.

Knickerbocker ANTHRACITE COAL COMPANY.

Offices, 426 and 69 Broadway.

CAPITAL STOCK, $600,000.

Shares 60,000 at $10 each.

NO INDIVIDUAL LIABILITY.

Superintendent: M. P. FOWLER, Mahanoy City, Schuylkill County, Pa.

Agent at 426 Broadway: CHARLES C. CARUAS.

Agent at 69 Broadway: C. D. ARNOLD.

The following gentlemen are Stockholders, and will act as an Advising Board:

SMITH SNEDEN, of the Leather Firm of C. Sneden, Jr., & Co., 9 John Street, Warren, and Broadway, N. Y.

JOHN DEAN, Agent of Chase & Co., 304 Broadway, N. Y.

SAMUEL PARSONS, of Herring & Co., 251 Broadway, N. Y.

GEORGE FOSTER PEABODY, Agent of Parsons' No. 9 Mercer Street, N. Y.

J. R. BROOKS, 72 Broadway, N. Y.

The Colliery owned by the Company is located in the second or middle coal basin in Mahanoy township, Schuylkill Co., Pa., and upon the line of a railroad in operation of the celebrated Honeybrook range of the Lehigh coal basin. Each share is entitled to a pro rata of the latest six months, producing large quantities of the purest and best coal for family use, free burning and clean, which makes it especially desirable for household purposes. It is capable of producing and shipping to market from 25,000 to 50,000 tons annually. The rent which the Company has upon the veins is very low for mining, and comparison more than 1,000,000 tons of coal above water level.

Every 8 stockholder is entitled to one ton of coal yearly, and for each share of stock held by them above the 8 not drawn coal, then the profit upon the coal to which to be entitled will be paid to him in cash.

Should more than 60,000 tons of coal be mined during any year, the profits derived from its sale will be divided among all shareholders alike, whether they have or have not availed to take coal at cost.

The books for subscription to the capital stock are now open at the office of the Company, 426 Broadway, corner of Canal street (upstairs), and 69 Broadway (first floor), where specimens of the coal may be seen. Full particulars given on application, either personally or by note.

Any friends there who have already subscribed can assist their orders for coal, which is now ready for

End of the War.

THE surrender of Johnston, the capture of Mobile, and the utter rout and dispersion of the rebel forces in Alabama, leave the United States without any organised opposition to its authority on this side of the Mississippi river. Beyond that stream there has not been, for a long time, any active insurgent force, but only a marauding, cotton-stealing band, in complicity with the Franco-Austrian authorities of Matamoras, and which, on receipt of the news from the East, will probably dissolve itself and disappear, the leaders retiring with their gains to Europe or Mexico, and the rank and file to their homes, where they will take up the rôle of coerced Unionists, appeal to the sympathies of the Government and the nation, and "gratefully receive" the shiploads of food and clothing which that appeal to the weak sentimentality of the North will be sure to draw forth. In every sense the war, as war, may be said to be ended. Crackbrained fellows like the bushwhacker Moseby, the trooper Hampton, the guerilla Rosser, and a few others may refuse to surrender; and a few ruffians, under the pretext of imitating Marion, but really for the sake of freebooting, with little regard as to who are their victims, will prowl about the country awhile, but they will soon be hunted down like wolves, and find themselves suddenly pendant – a grateful if not a graceful fruit of the nearest forest trees. The regimen administered to this class of marauders in Kentucky, Tennessee and Missouri will surely and speedily cure the heroics in which all Europe has prophesied the invincible Southron would indulge, in case he were overcome by the "brute force" of Northern hirelings and "Lincoln minions." We may safely leave those models of chivalry and recipients of foreign sympathy to the detection of the sable but loyal Americans, and the swift justice of the Provost Marshal and his convenient court.

The war is over. Frame the fact in whatever phrase we may, the result is nothing more nor less than this, that the slave aristocracy of the South, with all its adherents, bland or otherwise, has been utterly subdued, crushed, annihilated. Slavery has disappeared, with all the social and political fabrics, theories and systems founded upon it. It may take years, perhaps a generation, to obliterate the animosities and bitternesses to which this contest and precedent circumstances have given rise; but the healing is a mere question of time, and a judicious administration of the Government. The discordant element in our organization has disappeared, and henceforth a civil war, or an armed opposition to the constitutional authorities of the nation, is simply impossible. It took all the influences of ambition, arrogance, and selfish interest, based on the control of four millions of slaves, to originate the rebellion now happily suppressed. No such mighty and malignant inflences were ever before, or can ever again be combined in any cause. The nation has survived, and pulsates at this hour with a more vigorous life than at any previous period in its history. It not only lives, but it has a conscious assurance of immortality. It has unfolded to mankind the second page of the great lesson which, under God, it was raised up to teach, not alone that a Government may be framed by the people, but may be sustained, perfected and perpetuated by them, at whatever cost of life or expenditure of treasure.

Yet, a few years, and in what light will the poor, purblind and prejudiced wretches stand who have seen in this great struggle, now happily ending, only a paltry squabble over tariffs, or a contemptible sectional animosity! How they will wither and shrivel in the focus of the Historic lens! And those who thought and hoped through our dissensions and permanent disruption to resume a predominance in commerce which they could not sustain in fair competition, or to extend to this continent systems antagonistic to those which our example had founded and success sustained—where to-day are their hopes, and what to-day are the prospect of their plans and plots against Republican institutions?

This, however, is not the time for exultation, but of grateful acknowledgment to the Almighty for our great deliverance. We have been carried safely through the Red Sea, and have emerged safely from the Valley and Shadow of Death. We have been tried not only by the cruel ordeal of intestine war, of a magnitude to which all history furnishes no example, but as if to prove beyond all distrust the strength and perfection of our institutions, we have had the honored head of the nation and his chief minister stricken down by the assassin's hand, with no shock or jar to the even working of the Government. No trial to which a nation was ever subjected at home or abroad has been spared us. The bitter cup, which even the Son of God prayed might pass away from him, has been rigorously commended to our lips, and drained to its dregs. Yet, we live to-day, stronger, purer, more enterprising, manlier and better fitted to defend the oppressed, punish the insolent, and to carry out our mission of amelioration and beneficence towards mankind than before. Let us reverently acknowledge the palpable interposition of Heaven in our behalf, and address ourselves meekly to the faithful and full discharge of our duties. "Peace on earth and good will among men" was almost divinely paraphrased by our late President, who proclaimed, as his rule of action, "Malice towards none, Charity for all." This motto ought henceforth to encircle our national arms, beam from our starry flag, and above all its spirit should enter into and control the policy of the nation, at home and abroad. Then indeed will we be beloved for our conduct, as we must henceforth be respected for our strength.

PROSPECTUS

OF THE

Chimney Corner.

A NEW FAMILY NEWSPAPER.

Under this title there will be issued from this office a Weekly Family Newspaper, the first number of which will be published on Tuesday, the 16th of May. THE CHIMNEY CORNER will have always a continuous tale of a superior and unexceptionable order. It opens with a story from one of the most popular authors of the day, which deepens in interest with every succeeding chapter, and which is sure to enchain the attention of the reader. Each number will also have a variety of shorter stories from our best American writers, Sketches of Travel and of Society, Anecdotes of Natural History, Biography, Poetry, Agricultural and Horticultural Suggestions and Illustrations, Recipes, Family Medical Prescriptions, Notes and Queries, Parlor Pastimes, Merry Thoughts, Comic Pictures, Portraits and Illustrations, in the best style of American art, of all the departments to which the paper is dedicated.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER starts with a select corps of upwards of two hundred contributors, and has a complete editorial staff of established ability and large experience. It starts assured of success, and of gathering together a circle of readers which will widen daily, and to which it will prove an instructor and an entertaining friend and guest.

In addition to these literary attractions THE CHIMNEY CORNER will be the most elaborately illustrated Family Paper ever published, the designs being made expressly for it by the most eminent Artists.

Every number will also contain a most striking and correct portrait, exquisitely engraved, with an original biography of some eminent person, who has risen by his own exertions to a distinguished position in our Great Republic. This series will be termed

"The Self-Made Men of our Times."

With Nos. 1 and 2 of THE CHIMNEY CORNER will be presented, gratuitously, a magnificent plate, entitled

Grand Reception of the Notabilities of the Nation at the White House, 1865.

The picture contains nearly 100 portraits of our most celebrated Generals, Statesmen and Civilians, also of many of our most distinguised American ladies. The likenesses are admirable, having been taken from photographs by Brady.

This is the most costly gift plate ever presented by any publisher in the United States, having been produced at an expense of $10,000.

Every family should possess this truly national picture, and carefully preserve it, as it will transmit to future generations the men who have restored our great national unity. It is especially valuable, as it contains an excellent likeness of our late lamented President, introducing General Grant and his wife to Mrs. Lincoln. This costly plate is the first of a series which it is our intention to present to our regular subscribers.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER will be issued every Tuesday in New York.

It is electrotyped, and back numbers can be had by ordering the same of any News Agent.

Resumption of Specie Payments.

WE look confidently to an early return of specie payments. The fact that all nations, after long and expensive wars, have been slow to get rid of their irredeemable paper issues, implies little in our case, for no other nation ever possessed the elasticity and exceptional resources of our own. It is probably true that we have out, in the shape of legal tender and National Bank Currency, something between six hundred and a thousand millions. Of this between three and four hundred millions represent a previously existing bank-note issue in the loyal States; that is to say, this amount has only replaced an equal amount of paper money drawn or driven from the market. Another hundred millions represents an equal sum which, under ordinary conditions, would have been issued by the banks to meet the demand of an increased business and augmented population—the natural growth of trade and industry during four years. It may be safely asserted that at least five hundred millions of "currency," in the shape of portable notes, are now needed for the ordinary purposes of exchange and daily traffic in the loyal States.

There remain then, according to various estimates, an excess of from one hundred to five hundred millions of paper. Say, and this is probably not far out, two hundred and fifty millions redundant and to be got rid of, in order to bring the currency to the specie standard. How is this to be effected? The statement of a series of indisputable facts will answer the question better than any long and complex argument.

I.—The whole financial arrangements of the South are broken up; its banks are extinct; there is no currency there except the rebel shinplasters, which are only fit for kindling fires, and by no means expensive for that purpose. This vacuum must be filled, and filled by National Bank currency, the issue of which must fund an equal amount of legal tender and withdraw it from market. At least one hundred million sare required for this purpose, and for the new and active business which peace will create in the South and West.

II.—The expenses of the Government will soon fall, if they have not already fallen, from three millions to one and a half or one million per day—a sum that our existing sources of revenue can meet and furnish a sinking fund besides. Any outstanding debts of the Government are more than covered, as they mature, and funded through the subscriptions to the National loan, which exceed four millions daily. It will not require a very long time, at this rate, to absorb one or two hundred millions of currency.

III.—The demand for our securities abroad, already great, will be greater with the prospects of returning peace, and they will be paid for in gold or what is equivalent to it, exchange.

IV.—There can be no appreciation in gold, for it is abundant in fact and only kept at its present price by speculative operations, copperhead interest, and a redundant currency—the latter by far the least potential. Our shipments for gold for the last four years have averaged about seven millions less per year than before the war commenced, so that making but small allowance for increased production, we have now between thirty and forty millions of gold and silver more in the country than we had four years ago. To this sum we must add the amounts brought hither by immigration, which has been greater since the war began than before. The aggregate from this source cannot be estimated at less than $10,000,000. The banks on the first of Jan., 1861, held $80,000,000 of gold, and the Sub-Treasury, $4,000,000. The amounts held by private bankers and by individuals who have hoarded it have been estimated at $100,000,000. Beyond these sums, something very large, between fifty and one hundred millions of gold or exchange, which is the same thing, have been sent abroad by "weak sisters," or people who had no abiding faith in the integrity and perpetuity of the Government, and which will flow back with the return of peace.

We claim, therefore, that there is, in one shape and another, two hundred or two hundred and fifty millions of gold in the country.

There is nothing to draw this gold or any appreciable part of it away. The existing cotton in the Southern States, estimated by those who know best, is put as high as 2,000,000 bales, and in itself is sufficient to meet any balances of trade for a long time to come. At the high prices it will be sure to bring, this amount will come to double the value it would have commanded before the war, and give perhaps three times the return.

Petroleum has become a most important article of export, and cannot be overlooked in our future financial calculations. Twenty-five millions a year is the least we may estimate will be the export, and will stand in the place of so much gold—the article wherewith we have hitherto met our balances.

From these data we deduce that the demand for gold as an article of export will be much diminished, if not substantially cease; that the redundant currency of the country will be rapidly absorbed or go to fill a legitimate demand, and that the equilibrium between currency and gold will be speedily re-established. If these views be correct, prices of all descriptions must come down fully one-third, if not one-half, before the 1st of August next. To bring them there is an object of the Government and the wish of the people. Mr. McCulloch, Secretary of the Treasury, in a recent address, said:

"My chief aim will, of course, be to provide the means to discharge the claims upon the Treasury Department at the earliest day practicable, and to institute measures to bring the business of the country gradually back to the specie standard, a departure from which (although for the time being a necessity) is no less damaging and demoralizing to the people than expensive to the Government."

THE Toronto Globe of the 18th inst. puts the following pertinent queries to the friends of the Canadian Judge who refused to deliver up the principal of the St. Alban's robbers and murderers to the United States authorities:

"If Booth should escape to Canada, be arrested and brought before Judge Smith, and it should be found that the assassination of Mr. Lincoln was authorised by a Confederate officer, would the Judge refuse his extradition on the ground of the belligerent character of the act? Would he declare that the Ashburton treaty was abrogated, and refuse to surrender the assassin? We pause for a reply. To our mind there would be as much reason for refusing to give up Booth as the St. Albans raiders, supposing Booth could prove that he had authority from some officer of the Confederate States to commit the deed, which he probably had."

PRESIDENT JOHNSON, in presenting Sherman's agreement with Johnston to his Cabinet, said: "This proposition is not debatable, yet I shall be pleased to hear your comments on it."

CHURCH, the celebrated landscape painter, has gone to the West Indies. He intends to pass the summer with his wife in the mountains of Jamaica, where he will find a new and most interesting field of study. Mr. Church leaves behind him an unfinished painting full of power and of promise, a "Rainbow in the Tropics," and two pictures recently completed, which will materially enhance his reputation.

THE Boston Transcript comments with deserved and dignified severity on the extraordinary conduct of Gen. Sherman, and laments that the blow to his reputation should come so closely on the other calamity which has shrouded the land in grief. It says:

"The psychological wonder of this revelation is that a whole nation rises one morning to find that a man of genius it has almost idolized is another and radically different individual from the man of their imagination and belief, as read in the light of his public acts and the fair and obvious inferences flowing from them. What does it mean? There will be many theories of explanation, none free from doubt. The solution, as it seems to us, is, that two qualities, latent until now, have blazed out—inordinate ambition and a conceit so enormous as almost to touch the edge of insanity. We find them both in all this work. But we find the first especially in his virtually attempting to over-ride the province of the Government as maker of peace and in pledging himself "to obtain it," while utterly ignoring the clear action of Congress and Mr. Lincoln's declared preliminaries to all negotiations for peace. And the latter we find especially in the fact that he sees Wm. Tecumseh Sherman, in this whole wretched business, so engrossingly that he is blind to his duty, his Government and his nation."

THE wretched assassin Booth, with an accomplice named Harold, was hunted down by a detachment of Union cavalry, near Port Royal, Virginia, on the night of the 25th of April. They took refuge in a barn, and refusing to surrender, the building was set on fire and they were roasted out. Booth, showing fight, was shot like a dog, and died shortly afterwards. The other miscreant was taken alive, manacled and carried to Washington, where, in due time, he will be hanged, together with a number of other conspirators. There was nothing very grand in the exit of the murderer. Smoked out like a rat and shot like a dog! It was through information furnished by a negro that the clue was obtained to his hiding place.

The daily World very justly observes, that "In an age which has seen the 'rehabilitation' of pretty nearly all the once admitted scoundrels of history, from Catiline and Nero down to Robespierre and Marat, the dismal and altogether unscenic finale of this desperado's savage and senseless tragedy of president-murder is a thing for wise men to rejoice in."

IT has been very rationally proposed to raise a fund of $100,000 to be presented to the widow and family of the late President Lincoln, subscriptions to be limited to a dollar each. Mr. Benjamin B. Sherman, merchant, of No. 95 Wall street, is acting as treasurer of the "Dollar Memorial Fund;" and those who desire to co-operate in the work will greatly aid the speedy collection of the fund by presenting subscription lists to their customers, families and friends. Names of all the donors will be presented with the fund, and in due time published in some form.

MR. LINCOLN's grandfather, also named Abraham Lincoln, was murdered by an Indian in 1784, while at work on his farm near the Kentucky river. He left three sons, the eldest of whom, Thomas, was the father of the President. Thomas married in 1806 Nancy Hanks, a native of Virginia, and settled in Harden co., Ky., where the President was born Feb. 12, 1809. In 1816 the family removed to Indiana. The great-grandfather of the President emigrated from Berks county, Penn., to Rockingham county, in the Shenandoah Valley, Va., about 1750.

MR. BANCROFT, in his address on the day of Mr. Lincoln's funeral, in New York, said:

"The cry is delusive that Slavery is dead. Even now it is nerving itself for a fresh struggle for continuance. The last winds from the South waft to us the sad intelligence that a man, who had surrounded himself with the glory of the most brilliant and most varied achievements, who but a week ago was named with affectionate pride among the greatest benefactors of his country and the ablest Generals of all time, has usurped more than the whole power of the Executive, and under the name of peace has revived Slavery and given security and political power to traitors from the Chesapeake to the Rio Grande. Why could he not remember the dying advice of Washington, never to draw the sword but for self-defence or the rights of his country, and when drawn, never to sheath it till its work should be accomplished? And yet from this bad act, which the people with one united voice condemn, no great evil will follow save the shadow of his own fame. The individual, even in the greatness of military glory, sinks into insignificance before the resistless movements in the history of man."

ONE of the specifications of the agreement between Generals Sherman and Johnson would have re-established slavery in the seceded States which still have rebel Legislatures. Yet in a letter respecting recruiting throughout the insurgent districts of the South, written last July, Gen. Sherman said:

"No one will infer from this that I am not a friend of the negro as well as the white race; I contend that the treason and rebellion of the master freed the slaves, and the armies I have commanded have conducted to safe points more negroes than those of any general officer in the army."

Bryant's Ode for the Burial of Abraham Lincoln.—At the great meeting in New York on Tuesday afternoon, the following ode, written by William C. Bryant on Tuesday morning, was read by Rev. Dr. Osgood:

Oh, slow to smite and swift to spare,
  Gentle, and merciful, and just!
Who, in the fear of God, didst bear
  The sword of power, a nation's trust.

In sorrow by the bier we stand,
  Amid the awe that hushes all,
And speak the anguish of a land
  That shook with horror at thy fall.

Thy task is done; the bond are free;
  We bear thee to an honored grave,
Whose noblest monument shall be
  The broken fetters of the slave.

Pure was thy life; its bloody close
  Hath placed thee with the sons of light,
Among the noble host of those Who perished in the cause of right.

"An old correspondent" wants us to take up the "brutalities with which cattle are treated in our city, and especially how calves and sheep are carted through our streets." He says, and we all know it to be the fact, that "calves and sheep are carried through the city with their feet tied together with a strong thin cord, piled one on another, and packed so closely, with their heads drooping over often on the cart wheels, so that many die before the reach the shambles." And he asks what must be the kind of meat that is served to us, with these shocking and diseasing preliminaries to slaughter?

The question is one which must often suggest itself to reflecting men, but we are not yet quite prepared to respond to our correspondent's earnest and, no doubt, well-meant importunity to "put down" this abuse by illustrations and anathemas, such as he says, and he flatters us by saying, "carried out the destruction of the swill-milk trade." He forgets that we publish a paper for the whole country, and that local reforms of the kind he suggests should be carried out by those chiefly interested. The remedy he seeks for may be found in refusing to patronise butchers who practise the brutalities he condemns, and who poison us with fevered meats. It is time that we had abattoirs as the French have, where every animal brought to slaughter is examined by competent persons to decide on its condition, and where every piece of meat requires to bear a seal in evidence of its purity. Public health requires some guarantee against assault through the ignorance or unscrupulousness of butchers. These are matters, however, which ought to be taken up by the local press, but more particularly by our citizens themselves, who can well afford to spare an hour from business or pleasure to effect a great reform.

Mr. Bryant was among the speakers at the opening of the new building of the Academy of Design in this city, April 27th. Alluding to the progress of Art in the United States, and the peculiar influences on Art of our climate and scenery, he said:

"I have no doubt, for my part, that in the temperament formed by our diversified climate, the perceptive faculties are peculiarly awake and active, drinking in the sights and sounds of Nature with a deeper delight than in climates of a more uniform character, and that the power of invention is quickened by the same causes to the same activity and energy. These varying aspects of our skies, imposing alike in their splendor and their gloom, these grand alternations of our seasons, these majestic vicissitudes, passing from polar cold to tropical heat, and from tropical heat to polar cold, with the phenomena of each fierce extreme, were not given us in vain. The genius nurtured under their influences has, in the department of Art, commanded the admiration of the hemisphere from which our race was transplanted to this. The works of our great painters have been seen with delighted surprise in the old world; the masterpieces of American sculpture have divided the praise of mankind with the productions of the most eminent statuaries of modern times."

"No human society has a right to do wrong, whether to harm the innocent or to punish disproportionately the guilty for any ends of expediency, however plausible. The argument that punishment may prevent crime and protect society is insufficient of itself to justify any penalty that is not intrinsically and relatively just. Upon the divine equity and impartiality of punishment depend all its moral power, all its claim to submission and veneration, and all its worth for any purpose. 'He that justifieth the guilty, and he that condemneth the just, even they both are abomination to the Lord.' After the immense guilt of this rebellion, comprehending in incalculable quantity every crime man can commit, shall have been condoned and covered up, what poor single-handed murderer may not call his gallows to witness the meanness and injustice of the pseudo law by which he dies?"

Hon. Andrew Johnson, seventeenth President of the United States, is in the 56th year of his age. His family resides at present in Nashville, Tennessee, and consists of his wife and four children, two sons and two daughters. His son Robert is 29, and Andrew Johnson, jr., is 12 years of age. His two daughters, with their families, also reside in Nashville, having been driven from their homes in Eastern Tennessee. One of Mr. Johnson's sons, Charles, a surgeon in the army, was thrown from his horse in the year 1863 and killed, and Col. Stover, a son-in-law, commanding the 4th regiment of Tennessee infantry, was killed in the battle of Nashville, while gallantly leading his command, on the 18th of December, 1864. Judge Patterson, who is also a son-in-law of the President, lives in Nashville. Mrs. Johnson has been in very delicate health for some time past, and it is probable Mrs. Col. Stover will preside over the Presidential household.

Easy Lessons for Immature Minds.—A contemporary photographic journal, dedicated to popular instruction in the noble art of photography, has the following primary indications for the guidance of the innocents, upon which we advise all neophytes to act, incontinently:

"Under the title of Clydonics, derived from the Greek, Kludon, it is proposed to embrace those branches of Science which treat of Waves and Undulations; of Oscillations, Vibrations and Pulsations. By grouping in this manner manifestations of force through to and fro motions, more or less rapid, the student is enabled to view this class of reactions from a stand-point where comparative measurements and estimates greatly assist him in reaching and retaining correct conclusions. All the notes in Nature's harmony, heard and unheard, thus become a part of one grand gamut, extending from the profound sub-base of the great tidal wave, having a single diurnal culmination, upward through the diapasons of sound and color, to the very altissimo of the tremulous æth, whose waves—quicker than thought—generate a pitch far higher than the violet tone, and, being beyond the range of human vision, are only known to us by the wonderful effects they produce in the hands of the skilful photographer."

TOWN GOSSIP.

The fashionable excitement of the week past was the opening of the new National Academy of Design. There was a superb exhibition of the very latest fashions, both in dress and criticism, when they opened the show for a private examination on the evening of the 27th April. We are happy to announce that we were there, having gently hired a beautiful dresscoat, and decorated our boots with an ingenious composition that bestows all the effect of patent leather. We boldly mingled with the rest, and doubtless trod on many an artist's corns without knowing it, both in a literal sense and in the artless prattle we kept up about the pictures. We overheard the most expensive head of hair in the place say to the great Weinstadt, over whose shoulder it was bending, "Tell me candidly, Mr. Weinstadt, which do you really prefer as a matter of color, oils or worsteds?"

The immortal whom we have elaborately veiled under that opaque nickname exhibits but two pictures, the largest of which, the "Yo Semite Landscape," No. 426, does full justice to his previous reputation. Church is only represented by one canvas, surnamed "Twilight" (No. 310), and a few inches behind his usual ability in color and effect. But we must not begin with individual notices, or the sweet beguiling duty will make us forget all other items of news. Suffice it to say that the private reception was a vast success, and the brilliant new edifice praised by all, now that the scaffolding is down and its delicate proportions fully revealed.

Pasta is dead! We had almost written Norma is dead—for the rôle of Norma was composed for her by Bellini, and her great genius made it authoritatively her own. Pasta was a wonderful example of the power of native ability in conquering all sorts of disadvantages and insults of nature. Most skilful of vocalists, she had originally a horrible voice, hard, unequal and fickle. A wonderful actress, she was obliged to contend against all the disadvantages of a fearfully plain face and an undignified figure. It was her heart of fire and brilliant intellect that brought her through. In introducing herself to any part, she was able to see intuitively the utmost expression of which it was capable, and then by the hardest sort of labor she brought herself as close as possible to that ideal conception. It was with all the modesty of the earnest artist that she used to declare that she had never succeeded in expressing her own notion of a part. Pasta died near where she was born, in the neighborhood of Lake Como. It is thirty years since she has trodden a stage; the latter part of her life has been prettily spent as an elderly Proserpine, among her flowery parterres on the banks of the Festive Lake, and they buried her the other day with immense ceremonial in the cathedral of Como. In the style and acting of Grisi, we have seen something of the transmitted glory of Pasta—for Grisi was Pasta's niece, and borrowed and stole as much as her nature could hold from her grand old aunt.

It is a great pity, but one never feels, perhaps, as if a theatrical or operatic performer was really dead, in the sense in which ordinary mortals die. These shining personages are so constantly slaughtered in masquerade, they so habitually leap into torrents, or bite themselves with poisoned rings, or decorously retire with scarlet fiends, or ascend among fireworks into an elysium of dust and cobwebs, that even the last serious exit acquires a tinge of romance, and one can hardly persuade himself that there will not be a few more positively farewell performances.

Still, to the subjects themselves, we suppose there is an appreciable difference. Pictures have been painted, and tales written in abundance, the motive of which is the intrusion among the painted and factitious horrors of the stage of this shadowy and powerful tragedian. The old painted actor, or the hectic young danseuse, is depicted staggering through the part, the assisting performers stammer and forget in their sympathies, the audience find something wrong, and stare with white faces, when suddenly from the coulisse, leaps upon her, with the flashing of cataracts, "Death, the crowned phantom, with all the equipage of his terrors, and with the tiger roar of his voice." (These superb words are De Quincey's.)

So—it seems but yesternight—in the tiny, tidy theatre of the capital, the shining and happy crowd upon the benches were inveigled. The lights are gay, and there is the soft buz and flutter of a comedy audience. Half are listening to the humane and friendly wit of Asa Trenchard. Half are studying the lines upon that good shrewd face in the President's box. The lines are more and deeper than were seen four years before, when the face first showed among those draperies, and every one had been chiselled by fatherly, anxious care for the people who are there looking up like loving children into the President's fine eyes. The good man had himself been playing a rôle which he felt was nearly over. One immortal laurel, for the Emancipator, was even then softly shadowing his great forehead; and the evergreen palms, for the Pacificator, were beginning to stir and salute him. And in this hour of his gentle triumph he died. For a sharp pistol-snap was heard, and the cruel King sprang from the hand of a silly boy into the citadel of his life whom the nation had learned to love so well.

Always unwelcome, always malapropos, as these visits are, when did Death ever before seem so ferociously inopportune? When was regicide ever rejected of a whole nation like Booth?

We are pleased to see a suggestion for building a church upon the site of the dishonored theatre. No less radical a change could possibly exorcise the hateful genius of that place. If the walls of some saintly chapel were now to rise, to the awful music of a country's tears, from the ground poisoned with the presence of murder, the place might indeed seem clean once more. How holy, how religious would such a shrine appear! How Catholic should be the creed! With what tender meaning would rise the prayers of the people for the welfare of "the President of these United States." It seems as if the harsh divisions of sect would melt away in such a place, and pilgrims from every fold be drawn to the national Mecca, to light their lamps from the pure flame of patriotism that would burn at that sad altar.

The theatrical diversions have received such a stunning blow as they never felt before, and at the time we write are hardly on their legs again. Edwin Forrest, in the higher drama, drew some fair houses at the close of his engagement, his farewell rendition of Spartcus being especially successful. He has given the pas to Miss Maggie Mitchell.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean have been playing a short engagement at the Broadway Theatre, reviving the traditions of a lost school of acting. The most striking piece produced was the historical French play entitled "Louis XI," expressly translated for and appropriated by Mr. Kean, and the delineation was a piece of most carefully studied and accomplished acting. The gentleman has, however, been quite overdone by his management, and finds himself at a loss to carry the stupendous reputation which was arranged for him on his appearance.

We are coming on nobly, in matters of luxury and extravagance. Here is the lament of a hungry Parisian, who weeps and bids adieu to his favorite chef de cuisine. After noticing the exodus from Paris of an army of the most aristocratic cooks, he remarks:

"It seems that in New York democracy has become so intensely aristocratic that that it cannot longer dine at tables d'hôte, accordingly all the larger hotels there are about to establish restaurants—hence there is a great demand for French cooks. The first division of this new army of occupation left Paris to-day. Their pay is very high, and begins from the time of leaving. A large order for garçons has also been forwarded, but as yet the supply has not been found."

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—According to Detroit papers, the full half of last years' crops is still in the hands of the farmers of Michigan and Illinois, who are holding it in hopes of a rise.

—The value of the estate left by the late President Lincoln is estimated at $25,000.

—At a large meeting of the citizens of Carroll county, Maryland, after resolutions of condolence with the family of Mr. Lincoln and of confidence in the administration of Mr. Johnson had been adopted, it was unanimously resolved that the young men of the county who went South at the beginning of the war and cast in their lot with the rebels will not be tolerated in the county again.

—In view of recent events and developments, it is believed in some quarters, that Andrew Johnson, who has endured so much undeserved obloquy for his singular aberration on the 4th of March, was on that occasion under the influence, not of spirituous liquors, nor either of a mere disturbing drug, intended only to disgrace him, but of a deadly poison, furtively insinuated in his drink with the view to take his life.

—When J. Wilkes Booth played in Buffalo, three years ago, he broke a plate glass window in the store of O. E. Sibley, where a lot of rebel trophies were exhibited. He was arrested, paid the damage and a fine of $50, and the affair was kept out of the papers. He broke the window in his rage at seeing the exhibition of weapons taken from rebels.

—The Richmond Whig of the 27th learns from intelligent persons who reached there on foot from Danville, that when the surrender of Lee's army became known in Danville, a crowd of citizens and soldiers collected, and after a short consultation made a general rush upon the buildings containing commissary stores, which were plundered. One building, containing ammunition, while being searched by the populace ignited, blowing the building and some 50 persons to pieces.

—It has been decided by Judge Clifford, of the United States Supreme Court, that a man who expressed his joy at the assassination of President Lincoln is not fit to serve as a juror in the Courts of the United States.

—The Rev. J. Hyatt Smith, of Philadelphia, in an address to his people the other night, said: "I have heard censure pronounced upon President Lincoln because he visited a theatre. My friends, I look upon a patriot in a theatre as better than a copperhead at a prayer-meeting."

—Among the incidents of the Federal occupation of Petersburg was the application of the blatant Roger A. Pryor to Major-Gen. Warren for an order upon the commissary for rations. Pryor is now the meekest of submissionists.

—Among the circumstances tending to show that the plot to assassinate Mr. Lincoln, and other members of the Administration, was encouraged by the secessionists, is the advertisement which appeared in the Selma Dispatch, an Alabama paper, last December, offering, for a stipulated reward, to murder Mr. Lincoln, Andrew Johnson and William H. Seward. That such an advertisement, instead of being rejected with indignation, as it would have been in any community not brutalised by slavery, should have been admitted into a newspaper, indicates an approbation of its purpose. The following is the advertisement:

"One Million Dollars Wanted, to have Peace by the 1st of March.—If the citizens of the Southern Confederacy will furnish me with the cash, or good securities for the sum of $1,000,000, I will cause the lives of Abraham Lincoln, William H. Seward and Andrew Johnson to be taken by the 1st of March next. This will give us peace and satisfy the world that cruel tyrants cannot live in a 'land of liberty.' If this is not accomplished, nothing will be claimed beyond the sum of $50,000, in advance, which is supposed to be necessary in order to reach and slaughter the three villains.

"I will give, myself, $1,000 towards this patriotic purpose.

"Every one wishing to contribute will address box X, Cahawba, Ala."

—Gen. Burnside was lately accosted by some friends, who chanced to remember that during the General's western command he was brought into intimate contact with Andrew Johnson, then military Governor of Tennessee, and must, therefore, know much about the character of the citizen who, by the death of Mr. Lincoln, suddenly becomes the head of the nation. Gen. Burnside was asked: "Can we trust Andrew Johnson? Is he a drunkard, as has been said?" The General replied: "I know Mr. Johnson well. He was military Governor of East Tennessee when I commanded in the West. For some time he was in Louisville and Cincinnati, where I met him at all hours of the day and night, and in most important consultations, and I can say that I never saw him taste liquor of any kind, and never saw him when I thought he had tasted liquor. He was no drunkard then. In my opinion, he is a firm, loyal and talented statesman."

—Our forces entered Mobile on the 14th of April, after its surrender by the Mayor. It was found that the rebels had destroyed all the valuable materiel in the navy-yard, and sunk their two most powerful rams in Spanish river. Four hundred guns were captured by the army and navy, and large quantities of ammunition and stores.

—A year ago, when there were reports of a conspiracy in Richmond to murder President Lincoln, he said to a friend, "Well, even if true, I do not see what the rebels would gain by either killing or getting possession of me. I am but a single individual and it would not help their cause or make the least difference in the progress of the war. Everything would go right on just the same."

—Gen. Sherman, at the close of his strange agreement with Joe Johnston, places his Government on the same level with the fugitive thief who is now on his way to Mexico, with the specie of the Confederates. "Not being fully empowered by our respective principals"—that is the language employed by our General to designate equally his Government and the collapsed league of treason.

—The following is the official account of the number of men and arms surrendered by Lee: Paroled prisoners, 26,115; small arms, 15,918; cannon, 159; colors, 71.

Obituary.—Andrew Jackson, Jr., adopted son of the late President Jackson, accidentally shot himself while hunting near the Hermitage, Tennessee, on Monday week, and died on the Sunday following of lockjaw. He was a son of Mrs. Jackson's brother, Samuel Donelson, and a cousin of A. J. Donelson. He took his adopted parent's name, and inherited, at his death, the Hermitage and a large cotton plantation in Mississippi, both of which, however, passed out of his hands. He was 56 years of age, and leaves a wife, daughter and two sons. The sons cast their lot with the rebels, both entering the army. Samuel, the younger, was an officer in the rebel service, and was killed beyond Chattanooga. The eldest brother, Andrew Jackson, is a Brigadier-General in the rebel army. He terminated his military career in the surrender of Fort Morgan, in Mobile harbor, to the United States forces, at which time he was taken prisoner, and is now in our hands.

Foreign.—The Montreal Witness says: "But our danger will be imminent if any of the scoundrels implicated in this assassination (of President Lincoln) make their escape to Lower Canada. They would undoubtedly meet here plenty of influential friends. There would be found here Judges and juries to decide that they had used only a belligerent right. Indeed it will argue a strange inconsistency if those papers which have been foremost in screening the raiders, and have excused as a belligerent right the assassination of an innocent civilian at St. Albans, find fault now with those concerned in the murder of the Commander-in-Chief of the Federal armies."

MY CASTLE IN THE AIR.

BY MARY MARGARET.

WAKING, I dreamed, and dreaming saw
A castle rise in misty air,
With turrets in the far blue skies,
And many columns, grand and fair.
In the rich amber light it shone,
A fairy castle, all my own.

And borne upon the charmed air,
Rare music floated through its halls,
And floods of golden light illumed
The wondrous pictures on its walls.
Gay banners streamed from tower and hall,
And Fame was written on them all.

Bright fountains leaped from golden urns,
And fell in sparkling showers,
And the very air was tremulous
With the breath of many flowers.
Never in slumbers of the night,
Did sweeter vision bless my sight.

Around this lovely castle rose
Tall trees with vernal blossoms crowned,
Whence every drowsy wind that stirred
Diffused a sweet perfume around,
And bird songs fluttered, soft and clear,
Through all the dreamy atmosphere.

Each subtle spell of peace,
Beauty and music's witching tone,
Soft holy light, and flowery bloom,
Were round my willing spirit thrown.
The hopes that budded in Life's spring
Were there in radiant blossoming.

The friends that I had known and loved,
In early childhood's blessed years,
And when Fate bade our paths diverge,
Had parted from with many tears,
Those I deemed lost on Life's wide sea,
Were waiting there to welcome me.

Alas! while yet entranced I gazed
With a new sense of strange delight,
Slowly it faded in the air
And passed for ever from my sight,
Nor left one trace of sculptured tower,
Fountain or banner, tree or flower.

THE ROBBERS ALARMED.

RESCUE OF THE PRISONER IN THE STABLE.

THE HIGHWAYMAN OF THE BLACK HORSE;

Or, A Cure for Love and Suicide.

WHEN I was in England, something over twenty years ago, I encountered at the stage office in the Borough, London, a young man with whom I had made and enjoyed a casual intimacy about a year before in Philadelphia. There was a mutual surprise and cordial greeting. I was on my way to some friends in East Kent, and he just returning from a metropolitan trip to his residence near Dartford. Our routes were the same, though his extended only twelve miles out of London. Ten past it was just before the South Eastern Railway went into operation; hence the stage. We secured seats side by side on the front of the coach, and were presently whirling along behind a superb team of four-in-hand, charmingly held to their work by the knight of the ribbons, and apparently proud of and delighted with it.

Ah! what splendid coaching—and what marvellous roads were superseded by the rail. Surely this "fast age" will tolerate the lingering weakness of admiration which not even the circles velocity of the locomotive has completely eradicated in my mind and memory for that gay miracle of travel, the stage coach and four, with the master of the whip, self-poised and reliant amidst all the vicissitudes of the road; and those exquisitely graduated highway stones which reinculated the face of all England smooth as a parlor floor. I wonder in what condition they are now.

We were within three miles of Dartford, when forme Trendell—Joseph Trendell—that was his name, spoke of his homestead. I have quite forgotten how the subject was introduced, but from some word that was dropped, I have remarked that there was an interesting bit of romance connected with his family heritage.

"It could be a story," he said, "but I shall not have time for the relation before we part. We are making Dartford at a staggering pace, and shall be there in seven or eight minutes. See, yonder are the mills."

"What mills?"

"The powder mills for the manufacture of the celebrated Dartford powder."

"Gunpowder?"

"To be sure—Oh! I forgot you are American. But you must have heard of the Dartford powder."

"Certainly, I have, and shot with it frequently. Yet I had no little associated with it the idea of Dartford, as a place, that I did not at the moment recognize the connection."

"Well, now, Berrison, stop at Dartford, and spend a day or two with me, and I'll tell you my story with illustrations on the spot, somewhat modified since the events transpired."

I hesitated a moment. I had paid my fare to Maidstone, but having time—perhaps rather more time than money to spare—I closed with his invitation. Besides, the romance of the scene was beginning upon apparently the most inconsiderable incidents of our lives!

Trendell, Berrison and Innis—fine property by the way, for England—were situated a mile, more and less out of Dartford. A pretty, dark green, sandy-soiled road led to the villa—the inn was for him, with seats for two infront and one behind. The latter accommodated the servant.

At the house I was introduced to Mrs. Trendell.

"My wife, Mr. Barrison," he said, with all the complacency of a young husband of a month or two.

"My name is Berrison," introducing a young lady, the sweet and gentle expression of whose face had first attracted my admiration as she had entered the room. And then, like lightning, the inquiring thought flashed up in my mind—is she maid or wife? It was answered by the supplementary introduction after my own name, "Miss Jane Trendell."

Had I inadvertently betrayed my own emotions? Her eyes fell before my earnest gaze, and her face grew crimson as she curtsied and resumed her seat.

"Mr. Berrison is from America, wifey," said Trendell, and then Jane looked up, her momentary embarrassment changed by a new expression. It was the key to "history of speech." And for an hour before tea was ready how we chatted away, and how I "studied my subject," and admired the country and her glorious institutions, and it occurred to me that I might be suspected of some slight prejudice in favor of the Dartford Institution with such an animated exhibition of interest in all that I said, and occasionally discredited. But of course with the most suggestive remarks, that she was to blame certainly if I did some out "rather strong" under the circumstances.

After tea Trendell proceeded to redeem his promise about the narrative, but first took me outside and pointed out a certain window of the house, and at about a hundred yards distance a building, which had formerly been the stabling of the premises, now used for some other purpose.

"There you pointe," said he, "constitute the locale of the story, have that in mind. Our family name at the time was in the time of Woolfe. It changed to Trendell soon after the occurrence I am about to relate. The last Mr. Woodly lived in this house. He had what was not to be called in it is now, the Trendell property having been added since. Mr. Woodly was my great grandfather, and at the time of which I speak, he had been two of the last century—was a widower, and with his son, a young man of about twenty, and a daughter two years younger, a housekeeper, and as a rule a couple of maid servants, dwelt on the premises. All occupied the house at night, except the male servant, whose special duties were connected with the stable, and he proffered to make his domicile in an upper room of that building which I showed you.

"It was a period at which the operations of the footpad and the highwayman were still carried on at Inderwell, a gradually increasing risk to the gentry engaged in these exploits. Within a year of the particular time to which I refer several very daring managed highway robberies had been successfully perpetrated within four or five miles of Dartford, above and below the town, the victims having always been relieved of a considerable amount of plunder. By no chance did the cheerful rogue find a cent worth in the victim's wallet. Their enterprise was never profitless.

"The most prominent villain in this vicinity, and he was a villain in the most exquisite, was notorious as the accomplished rider of a large, strong, swift black horse, and who was believed, from observation of his movements, to be about to extended by an assemption on foot. Certain it is that when his victim had turned to fly, on the sudden appearance of the black steed and his rider, he had been brought up within one or two hundred yards on his line of retreat by a follow with a short piece at his shoulder, a head drawn upon the rider, and a peremptory demand to 'Halt.' And upon yielding under those plausible circumstances, the footpad would quietly retire to the hedge or woods at the side of the road, while the form of the black horse coolly demanded and received the 'swag'—the flash term of the property stolen. On taking his departure, the fellow would gruffly command the pale-cheeked and frightened traveller to remain upon the spot for a quarter of an hour, assuring him that he was under the muzzle of a thunderbuss with half a dozen slugs in it, and he would have a taste of their quality if he disobeyed. Then he would spur off at a gallop without looking behind him. These robberies not only occurred at intervals, sometimes of months, and they were supposed to have been perpetrated by a couple of wandering but yet systematic scoundrels, who occasionally brought Dartford within their range of operations.

"Mr. Woodly, beside his agricultural interests was a minor partner in monetary affairs in a commercial house in London, and frequently passed a week or two at a time in the city. The facilities of travel were limited then and much less resorted to over the present day, and he was accustomed to ride on horseback. He never kept an amount of money in the house to tempt the burglar; and used very little cash. His son, Edward, was a plucky youth, and would, according to our tradition, have rather liked an adventure. Jesse Bradley, the male servant, occupied a room at the top of outpost, and there was really no danger to be apprehended.

"No story would be worth much, I suppose, without a tissue of love interwoven somewhere in the fabric.

I cast an involuntary glance at Jane, and I think her eye just escaped an encounter with mine. She would deny the imputation if I dare say, and I would not insist at this day.

"I told you," resumed Trendell, "that the Trendell estate joined the Woodly property. The Trendell estate, in fact, was only a little over a quarter of a mile from this house. Young Joseph Trendell, at the time of the occurrence I am about to mention, and the accepted suitor of Ann—called in the style of the day—Nancy Woodly. Clifton Woodly was a young girl, the daughter of a retired naval officer, residing about three miles below Dartford, Miss Pinkie spoiled, but was a fine-hearted, dashing young creature, and been quite beautiful, and very fascinating in her manners. She had bewitched young Woodly at a country ball given at the house of a friend, and enamored with her from that hour. He had repeatedly pressed her for a favorable response to his suit, and had at last received it, and from that moment Trendell accidentally discovered that she was deliberately trifling with his friend Clifton, and encouraging his hopes. He had a position in another quarter—the son of a London alderman, a larger and wealthier landowner. But Trendell failed to communicate the fact to Woodly just he was the type of Miss Speller, with by a little perseverance and bribery he was able to secure Clifton, that on a certain night Miss Spyder would give audience to his rival during the absence of her father.

"Upon this information Clifton called upon Woodly early in the day, though not well pleased with the part he was about to play. It was a pleasant night in October, with the moon at the full. The housekeeper and maid servant had retired, and Clifton told his sister his purpose, as he left the house, that he should not be back till late. At Captain Spyder's pretty Ritz cottage, whose surrounding shrubbery, hallowed by his youthful vows, was paradise of poor Clifton's only experience in life.

"There was no fight in Jesse Bradley's bit, and no Clifton had no doubt that he could ride the whole bed for an hour or two, he opened the stable with his own key, saddled his little bay and rode off.

"What really took place at Spyder Cottage never transpired. Suffice it that Helen Spyder married the alderman's son about three months afterwards. But as that evening Clifton Woodly rode down in a state bordering upon distraction. To his tortured spirit and excited imagination, there could be no relief but in suicide. He could not bear the thought of meeting any member of his family or one of his friends. He especially could not endure with his sister or with her lover, his best friend, young Trendell. He never deliberately resolved upon self-murder, but during a Bedlam left under similar circumstances, he seriously contemplated solving their knots, poison, pistols, &c., &c., and ultimately preferred the process of shutting off a worthless woman's love, not discerning the most rational way of disposing of such an article.

"Riding up to the stable he perceived a dim light in his sister's room, and concluded that she was either sitting up for him, or had left a lamp burning and dropped off to sleep, expecting to be roused when he came in, and to be relieved of the load of his confidence. He dismounted, led his horse into the stable, and then, by the aid of the moon, which was now high enough to throw a faint light which the moon in the horizon at its rise had not yet attained, he found the stall of his father's black horse was vacant?

"The moon was strange. He knew it was past the season when the horses were suffered to remain in the pasture all night. Two other horses were in the stable. These he fed, groomed and stabled there. What could possibly have become of the black? He called Jesse Bradley—but there was no response. He searched the harness room—no response. He mounted the ladder to the apartment above, and, to his still greater surprise and alarm, found the door open and Bradley absent. The first thought was that Bradley had taken the horse; then it occurred to him that the groom might have a love affair on hand, and was among the stars on a convenience of his amour. He was still puzzling himself for an explanation of the affair when he heard footsteps and voices about the stable door, which he had closed, however, before mounting the loft to explore the condition of his. He could not, therefore, hear what was said, but hastily reviewing all the facts and ascertaining the presence of two men where he expected only one, suspicion was aroused, and he determined to learn more before he discovered himself. Then, all at once, it flashed upon him, that Bradley and his uncle's black horse were the actual terrors of the road—the fiances of the highway exploits about Dartford. With this sudden conviction in his mind, he realised also the desperate character of the men, and the danger to which he was himself in a moment exposed. He carefully crept up into the loft—Bradley's room; or they might go into the harness-room, at the other end of the stable, and he was lost. Then, if it was unsafe to remain there; and as he knew that he could descend through a trap-door in the floor of the loft, upon a pyramid of hay in transom, piled below, he dropped through and quietly scrambled himself between a upper and lower bulk. In a moment afterwards he heard a key in the door, and a stranger's voice exclaim:

"Why, the door won't unlock it, and at the same instant the latch was lifted and the door thrown open. "Why, the door wasn't locked, Jesse.

"But it was locked, for I locked it when I came out,' Bradley replied, who had for some reason also entered the stable with his companion.

"I suppose you thought you did; but I didn't unlock it.'

"Well it don't matter whether I did or not; nobody's been here, of course. Strike a light, and let me get this ridiculous bridle out of my hand. Here, you rascal, you've been bridled, just beside the door; you know where to find it by this time, I suppose?'

"A little was produced, but transferred at once from the snatch to a dark lantern, and the two men proceeded to the harness room out of Clifton's view. They had been there, however, but a few minutes when, either in consequence of an attempt Clifton made to overthrow the chest of drawers or from his weight causing a gradual yielding of the pile of hay, several trusses gave way, and he was precipitated to the floor, but was still concealed in his position, though almost suffocated by the end of one as it had fallen upon his head. He could distinguish the two men from the stable, and they surveyed the fallen pile by the light of their lantern, as Clifton could perceive in the occasional flashes.

"'D——n, how it scared me,' said the stranger voice.

"'You are a chicken, Jack; I always said so,' was Bradley's remark. 'You can't make a Bow street officer out of a truss of hay.' And then they moved off to the room.

"This is a bad night's work, Jack. The swag is good. There is five hundred and eighty pounds in gold and bank notes, and every bit the killing of the d——dest fool ever lived—in these parts.'

"'Well,' was the response; 'if I hadn't smashed his cock he'd a shot me.'

"'Oh, 'twas all right; he choosed to be cantankerous, and—get it, Jack, bring blows over without their suspecting any of us, we'll move now. Eighteen months as a pretty good run. Heaved says there will be another good haul next week if this same sort—a travelling collector from a London house, as this poor devil was. But may be it won't be so well for us. I plant this bay, and we will meet to-morrow night at Swan top and divide. Would better get away, now.'

"'Don't like to ride in the dark.'

"'I'll get him in before daylight.'

"'Jesse, let me have five guineas to-night.'

"'D——n, you've had your share, Jack.'

"'Never you mind; I want a guinea for Sal.'

"'Yes, and Sal will fetch you some of these days.'

Then as they went back into the harness-room together, Clifton made an effort to relieve himself from his position, but was down again after a truss, leaving him fairly exposed, before he could make an attempt to conceal himself, or even to avoid being the recipient of a new fairly alarmed.

"'Hulle, whats this?' exclaimed Bradley, as he caught an indistinct view of Clifton's form in the hay. 'Jack, look!'

"'You scoun't put the light on me, Bradley; you know my voice.'

"'Mr. Clifton Woodly,' said Bradley, in a low, husky tone, and at the same time drawing a heavy horse-cloth, 'I beg pardon for you. Don't you make a whisper, only as I speak to you, or you're a dead young man. You know too much. How the devil did you get here, I wonder?'

"'I had been out with my own bay on pasture-business, and had just got home, when I missed my uncle's horse, and at that moment you came up.'

"'Is there anybody else by?

"'What do you mean?

"'Aint you here because we are suspected?'

"'No, on my honor. I have just returned from Captain Spyder's.'

"And as Clifton said this, he afterwards declared it was the first time he thought of his own position in relation to his father's horses. Was it amongst the hay he had never once thought of suicide. On the contrary, his whole mind had been occupied with the means made of escape from the stable, that he might affect the arrest of these cold-blooded villains; and now that he was fairly caught, he made no occasion to revert to the incident of his own trouble, instead of committing his self-respect to Pinkie Spyder, he sank into insignificance, and he grew intent upon the possibility of ending the imminent danger to which his sister would be exposed.

"'Mr. Clifton,' said Bradley, grasping him by the arm, 'come along into the harness-room, and you shall have my secret. I don't want to hit you, but we must take care of you, for a day or two. I've got a place where you can lodge a little while. We'll have to take a ride together before daylight. Now you get down there till we can settle affairs up here.'

"There was beneath the harness-room a cellar, commonly used for storing winter apples, potatoes, &c., for the use of the farm hands. To it was into this place that Clifton was directed to descend, as an extemporaneous prison. A square opening in the floor, and a ladder formed by inserting sticks in the ground at the bottom and nailed to the beam above, was the convenience of communication. He turned to speak, to suggest, in fact, that he might as well remain in the harness-room.

"'Never mind,' said Bradley, at the same time handling the gun pistol, 'you speak only when you are spoken to. Go down there, and keep yourself as still as a mouse. You won't have long to stay—when we've considered what's to be done. If you make a noise there to alarm the house, by——, you never see your life don't worth a straw—you know that?'

"And Clifton did know it. The contrast between the faithful, kindly, old-fashioned groom, Jesse Bradley, and the stern, cool, impassive, deliberate highwayman, was most significant and startling. Another flash, and he would be called him, was evidently but a passive tool in his hands.

"Clifton, quiet in his prison place, was soon intent upon a consultation carried on in whispers between his two fellow-captives. He could not catch all, for as every locality of his being seemed to have become, he could now distinguish a single word. Presently the thought occurred to him that the very best thing for them to do would be to knock out his brains, and bury him right there in the cellar, and he set about to see if it were possible that they would arrive at any other conclusion. It was just what he should do if he were in their place.

"At that moment his attention was arrested by a feeble glimmer upon the wall opposite to where he stood. It was small in space, but as he put out his hand towards it, and his fingers were visible in the slender ray. He turned, and perceived that the moon-light was shining through a small grating beneath the door of the harness room. The grating was, in fact, the only opening above the line of the cellar, and to the rest the dwelling-house. With the discovery of this aperture came a faint hope of escape—until checked in its upward bounds by the thought that it was about six inches square and crossed by three small rods of iron. It had been placed there as an air hole for effluvia of the fruit and vegetables, when the trapdoor was shut down above.

"In looking through the aperture he could distinctly see the horse and his sister's window, and again he thought he saw her figure there. But he was not mistaken. There was her white dress. It was indistinct, but he was sure she was there. In a moment all was relized. She had heard the noise impossible to contemplate. To be murdered within call of his own beloved sister. His father was in London, and there was no one in the house—no one but his sister, the housekeeper and maid-servant. He would not his own chance of life by any shout, and he would not for the world risk the cost of hers—nor hers alone; those monsters would sacrifice them all from the very necessity of their position.

"Still those murmurs above. Every minute was precious; every moment he was nearer to his fate, yet all powerless to act. He must submit to be hopelessly cut off. He took out his watch to endeavor to observe the time by the comparatively feeble light of the moon. He discovered that he did not remember looking for the time at all, for as the crystal of his watch glanced to the face, a thought flashed upon his mind, kindling in an instant a vague, indefinable hope of rescue. Again he looked towards his sister's window. There was nothing there. Nevertheless, he held his watch to the grating so that the beams of the moon should fall upon the face of it, and he took care that what they might be reflected against the window of his sister's room. By his dumb-show he rendered impossible to be observed by either the moonbeams were rigidly reflected or not, but he had the satisfaction presently again to perceive Nancy's figure at the window, and he knew from some time—longer than before. Then it disappeared, but returned again in less than a minute, and the window was shaken as before. He kept the watch in quick, short motion, so as to convey an idea of human agency and design. So he continued to do for half an hour, when he could just hear it. Fortunately, the villains over his head were too deeply interested in their discussion to observe the sound of the horse's hoofs upon the turf.

He persisted with the movement of the watch, and Nancy continued to observe it from her window. Then he ceased to observe them for a minute, and closed the window with a more distinct noise of the sash, as it went down upon the frame. There was a pause in the conversation above?

"You had better keep still there, Mr. Clifton Woodly, for your own sake.'

"There was no noise,' he replied, 'it must have been a rat; there seems to be plenty of them here.'

"When you are spoken to, don't you speak down there.'

Clifton kept his watch in motion and again saw a figure at that window of his hope, but it was now grayed in darkness. In a few minutes he saw a dim, shadowy passage from the interior at the side of the house, and more cautiously towards him, when he turned the reflected moonbeam downward upon her face and arm advanced. She drew towards him with noiseless step, and stooped to the grating without moving her head, when he found the watch between the bars into her hand. She started back, and he feared was about to speak, when, to prevent a calamitous ple, he audibly asked, in a subdued tone:

"Bradley, how long are you going to keep me here?'

"The response was immediate and distinct.

"'If you ask any more questions, or speak again, d——me if I don't finish you on the spot.'

"Nancy, with a chill at her heart, glided away as noiselessly as she had approached.

Then she was aware of a significant hiding done at the house, infinitely to the satisfaction of the anxious prisoner. He could only guess what his sister would do, and he knew that whatever she determined upon would be done at once. But his solicitude now became painfully intense, as the chance for escape had assumed the hopeful aspect of probability, and time seemed to have become a very laggard and scoffer at his hope. There was presently a movement above, as if some decision had finally been concluded upon; yet nothing more occurred than a footstep pacing the floor two or three times, which Clifton felt confident was Bradley's. Presently he seemed to seat himself again, and Clifton distinctly heard the question, in a quick, sharp whisper:

"'Will you do it, Jack? I'll give you fifty guineas if you'll take it off my hand.'

"'Sh—, sh—' was the response, and there was a resumption of the murmurs, just as Clifton perceived several dark forms stealing through the shade of the tallest shrubbery towards the end of the stable in which the harness-room stood. There was a window at that end, which was closed in at night by a wooden shutter, but it appears that crevices in the shutter admitted a view of the interior from without.

"'Footsteps outside by ——,' exclaimed Bradley, in a low tone. 'Shut the lantern.' But it was too late. In the very next moment the window shutter and sash were dashed in by the blow of an axe; a lantern threw its light into the room, and a couple of double-barrelled guns were levelled at the heads of the two startled, trembling ruffians.

"'Surrender, you villains! If you move hand or foot you are dead men,' was shouted out in the clear ringing voice of Joseph Trendell, and in that instant Clifton Woodly sprang up the ladder from below, caught Bradley's pistol from the table and him by the collar, and thus the miserable wretches were secured at the very instant they had determined upon the perpetration of another crime. Never was retributive justice more complete.

"The rest of the story is very soon told. Hennell, the third member of this precious trio, turned out to be an office clerk and head waiter of the Swan Inn, Dartford, for at that time inn servants were not so 'bumptious' as they are now. He kept his two comrades posted about the good customers at the Swan, so that they never made a false or unprofitable move, unless they missed their man. In this last exploit they had killed their victim, in consequence of his resistance. They were conveyed to Maidstone jail, tried at the ensuing assizes, convicted, and executed on Penenden Heath.

"Nance explained her agency in the affair, which is no doubt apparent to you. Her attention was arrested by the flashing of the reflected moonbeams from the grating, and she was instantly impressed with the conviction that it was the effect of an intelligent design. After a few minutes observation, she was confident that it was intended to attract her notice. She had waited for Clifton until she had grown anxious about him, and at last thought that he might have fallen down by the stable, from some accident, and was unable to rise. But as she descended the stairs her thoughts took the form of a suspicion that there was some foul play on foot, and she accordingly resolved to approach cautiously. Upon ascertaining the actual state of affairs, she concluded to trust nobody in the house, and ran off at once to Trendell Place, where, upon informing Joseph of the facts, a little posse comitatus was improvised in a few minutes, with the result I have told you.

"Clifton never married. Joseph Trendell, soon after this affair, led Nance Woodly to the altar, and at Clifton's death, which occurred in his fortieth year, the estates were joined, and my grandfather, with his wife Nance, took up their residence here, as Trendell Place was falling into decay."

And so my friend finished his story. I have only to add that a branch of the Trendell family, in the female line, has from about that time flourished in America, with scions thereof to honor the parent stock, but known by an entirely different name.

SERGEANT BOSTON CORBETT,

The Avenger of Mr. Lincoln.

SERGEANT CORBETT, the soldier who shot Booth, the assassin, belongs to Co. L, 16th New York cavalry. He was born in London, England, in 1832; and came to this country when seven years of age. He has lived in Troy, N. Y., where he learned his trade as hat finisher, and subsequently worked in Albany, Boston, Richmond and New York, and enlisted in the latter city in the 12th New York State Militia, Col. Butterfield. While serving under Col. Butterfield he called the Colonel to order for swearing. The present is his fourth enlistment. Corbett is a regular Cromwellian and a devout Christian. About seven years ago he became converted, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in Boston. Never having been baptised, he says he was at a loss what name to adopt, and he therefore made it a subject of prayer, when he believed himself instructed to take the name of Boston, the place of his conversion. He was accordingly baptised, upon joining the church, Boston; and his name stands upon the muster roll of the company as Boston Corbett. His religious faith would in the present age almost be called fanaticism. On Friday night he visited McKendry chapel and prayed with great earnestness that God would not lay innocent blood to our charge, but bring the guilty to punishment. He feels assured that Booth was delivered into his hands in answer to his prayers. He is a young man of great natural intelligence, and, aside from a modest reserve, converses with much freedom and interest.

In his statement describing the scene of the capture, he declares that he did not intend to kill Booth:

As he passed by one of the crevices in the barn I fired at him. I aimed at his body; I did not want to kill him; I took deliberate aim at his shoulder, but my aim was too high. The ball struck him in the head, just below the right ear, and, passing through, came out about an inch above the left ear. I think he stooped to pick up something just as I fired. That may probably account for his receiving the ball in the head. I was not over eight or ten yards distant from him when I fired. I was afraid that if I did not wound him he would kill some of our men. After he was wounded I went into the barn. Booth was lying in a reclining position on the floor. I asked him:

"Where are you wounded?"

He replied, in a very feeble voice, his eyeballs glaring with a peculiar brilliancy:

"In the head. You have finished me."

He was then carried out of the burning building into the open air, where he died about two hours and a half afterwards. About an hour before he breathed his last he prayed for us to shoot him through the heart and thus end his misery. His sufferings appeared to be intense.

THE FUNERAL HONORS TO PRESIDENT LINCOLN.

THE mournful interest which attaches to all the relics of our lost chief will be gratified by the various contributions made by our Artists. Besides the large engraving representing the funeral procession as it divided the sorrowful multitude in the heart of Broadway, we are able to present pictures in detail of the various accessories of the burial. Careful drawings have been prepared of the coffin which held the honored clay; of the car in which it traveled to its final resting-place in Springfield; of its transit by ferry to this city, and of every other particular and incident connected with the sad journey. These will be regularly laid before our readers as space permits, so that they will have the mortal part of their martyred chief constantly before their eyes, up to the moment when it mixes with the friendly dust of Illinois.

INTERVIEW BETWEEN SHERMAN AND JOE JOHNSTON.

ON the 18th of April Gen. Sherman arranged with the rebel Johnston his singular compact for the immediate suspension of hostilities, and memorandum for what he called a basis of peace. The action of Gen. Sherman was promptly rejected by the President, the Cabinet and the nation.

Our Artist, Mr. Taylor, was present at this scene. He says in his letter:

"Upon their arrival at the ground the two Generals proceeded to James Bennett's house, and between the four walls of the single groundfloor room which composes the main building was held their conference. The staff officers who accompanied their respective Generals remained outside, leaving the interview strictly private. Some of our officers made attempts at civility, but all overtures were rejected by the chivalry.

"Gens. Kilpatrick and Hampton, however, had quite an animated conversation regarding the campaign in which they had figured as foes."

In our engraving, the figure to the right exhibits the dogged attitude characteristic of Gen. Kilpatrick. The rather grandiose officer supported against the carpenter's bench is Gen. Hampton—his brother, the Major of that name, is sitting immediately to his left.

COLD WORSHIP.

No one asks of a man in New York, "Is he good? is he noble, self-sacrificing, intellectual, knowledgeful?" Oh no. The Manhattanites feel no need of all these things. They ask only one question, far more cognate than such trivial incidentals—"How much money has he got?" Naturally enough, too; for why should they be solicitous about the existence of qualities in another, when they know by experience that their possession makes not the smallest difference in this community either to him or to themselves? And why should they not be anxious about the solitary attribute which they have learned to believe is of far more consequence than all the rest put together?

I have read, that in the noble old commonwealths of Greece and Rome, it cost heroic deeds against the enemy, eminent virtue, transcendent ability, to raise one man above another, and that wealth had no share in it. I have read that, in the Middle Ages, when commerce was in its infancy, and men were either nobles or vassals, true knights disdained mere gold, and were honored by the world as by their peers, in proportion to their bravery and self-denial. I am afraid that, so far, in America, we have not improved in these matters upon antiquity, or upon the days of chivalry. It is a dreary thing to say, but no less a true one, that money has come to be regarded with us as the sole basis and measure of social position and influence. The results of so refined and elevated a system are tolerably conclusive as proving its existence, and are to be found in American manners and society both at home and abroad. We are behind nearly every other civilised nation as regards the standards and essentials of recognised good breeding in most of the various strata of our society. American families, who have been taught that money is the only god, bristling with parvenue airs and graces, squander and fritter and swagger about Europe, the laughingstock of every cultivated man or woman with whom they come in contact. This pervading gold worship, which, although it exists in old countries, finds its level in their more complicated social adjustments, is fearfully potent in sapping the principles and corrupting the heart of a new one. It vulgarises society; it crushes letters: it fosters the marriage of convenience; it degrades and casts down the graces of character and intellect, to set up in their stead the image of a coarse and sensual Mammon. The Constitution, indeed, says that men are born free and equal; but your gold worshippers say that is only true until some men have swept together more dollars than the rest. A low fellow comes back from California or Nevada with a fortune swiftly amassed, by dint of luck or rapacity, from the pockets of others less fortunate. Straightway arise pæans of praise from the delighted throng, and the incense of their adulation tickles the nostrils of Crœsus without ceasing while his money lasts. But suppose a sudden crash in stocks, suppose some unforeseen accumulation of disasters, and suppose these new got spoils of Mariposa take wings to themselves and fly away! I opine that nowhere in the world is Crœsus so quickly discovered to be a fool, or a knave, or both, as in New York; and that nowhere else can be found so shameless an ignorance of the fact that his faults were never discerned in his prosperity. It is an old, old story, I know, in other worlds beside the New, but more sharply pronounced, methinks, in a community where the only title to respect or consideration being snatched from him, the unfortunate has nothing else to requite a measure of condolence, or to soften the bitterness of his fall.

Money-worship afflicts us in the kitchen in America as well as in the drawing-room. Every ignorant foreigner who seeks a home here is soon taught to become insolent and self-asserting, first by our theoretical equality, and next by our practical exception in favor of riches. The uneducated are as quick to see and appreciate this fact as are their superiors. They understand clearly that we do not respect, set up, crown with honor, brain or worth, unless we can make them in some manner specially useful for our private ends, political or otherwise. But they see that we adore wealth! They see us dancing merrily and dutifully before the car of its possessor, with loyal homage and admiring genuflexions.

What wonder that Bridget flounces past her mistress, gorgeous in rainbow frippery, and thoroughly satisfied that if her dress be sufficiently costly, she is "as good as anybody" can be?—or that John the coachman, in his "black suit" and pinchbeck jewellery of a Sunday, imparts the same sentiment to his fellows with the usual masculine addendum? We are constantly living and acting as if to establish the principle, that it is safer and better to bow down to Rothschild or Astor than to Plato or Bacon; we must not be surprised if servants and children, and all other imitative animals, profit by the example. When we persuade the young that there is no country so great, so noble, so well-bred as their own, we may be cultivating patriotism, albeit at the expense of a respect for veracity: but there is no such saving clause, no such qualified compensation, when we teach them to love money for its own sake; we are then simply stimulating their greed and developing their selfish egoism at the cost of all that is most noble and chivalrous in the human soul. It is a sad thing to say, but I believe a strictly true one, that intellect is less respected and esteemed in America to-day than in any other civilised country. Perhaps, to define my meaning more exactly, I should qualify the statement, and write, intellect of the sort which cannot be made immediately available in the way of making money. That such a state of things should exist is, after all, not remarkable. It is the characteristic of a new country, where nearly all must labor, and few get time to think. In California and Australia it is more apparent than even in the Atlantic States. The newer the country, indeed, the more natural, and therefore perhaps the more pardonable, such a sentiment becomes. But America is old enough now, as the phrase goes, to know better. It is high time a social condition should be superseded which reminds you unpleasantly of the old days one reads of, when the parson and schoolmaster, as well as the clerk and the scrivener, fed in the servants' hall, and were lodged with butler and coachman; but so long as most rich men, who have made their own fortunes, behave in a way which convinces you of their secret belief that a return to those particular old-fashioned usages would be highly proper and desirable, a change for the better seems unlikely.

On the other hand, the social prejudice against people in trade finds small favor in a community where almost everybody is concerned in it. So little known, in truth, is such a prejudice, that I believe the majority of Americans never seriously consider, if they have ever even heard of, the fact that trade has sometimes been regarded as ignoble, and its followers as mean. And yet the proportion of reason and logic on which that prejudice has rested was never more broadly illustrated and confirmed than among the trading masses of the American people during the present generation.

Let me here, and to avoid being misunderstood, put my meaning into unmistakable terms. I know how much good trade has done for mankind. I know that the vast and ever-increasing exigencies of modern commerce have called into existence the most extended machinery for the comfort and sustenance of the masses of the world's inhabitants which has yet been known in its history. I admit that, if to make men "happy, comfortable, and rich, with time for reading and time for reflection," is worthy or noble, there is more credit due to trade than to any other agency, either before the age of chivalry or after it. I go further, and acknowledge that commercial necessity has given birth to a great number of those deeds and incidents which have most thoroughly touched the hearts of mankind, and stirred imaginative natures to the highest flights of which they are capable. To discover a shorter path to the Indies, Columbus steered the course which brought him to this new world of ours: and what more glorious or poetical than the associations which cluster around that memorable voyage? With a similar object were planned the expeditions in search of a north-west passage—those expeditions of Franklin and Kane and McClintock, so rich in interest, so heroic as examples, so sad in some of their conclusions. Commercial necessity too, has led to the paths opening into the vast treasures of Oriental knowledge, which otherwise had remained perhaps for ever unknown to us. It is trade which built the Great Eastern and Britannia Bridge. It is trade which extends its arms across the boiling Niagara, and which girdles the broad Atlantic. It is trade which brings down as servants the thunderbolts of Jove, and which carves itself a passage through the bosom of Mount Cenis. Hannibal and Napoleon scaled the Alps in pursuit of their vast schemes of glory and renown, but it remained for trade to consummate the mightier achievement of piercing their everlasting foundations.

I find, too, ideas of romance—images of vastness and of splendor conjured up by the recital of these achievements of commerce, these miracles of trade. Show me an instance, the grandest you can find in history, wherein the necessities of war or the ambition of a king has wrought some colossal labor, and I will surpass it with one yet more prodigious, called into existence by the exigencies of trade. What, too, endows most of the great charities and institutes of learning? What, for example, in America, establishes Girard colleges, Astor libraries, Lawrence scientific schools, Cooper institutes? Not the bloodbought gold of potentates or feudal proprietors, but the trade-gained contributions of successful merchants. Thus the works of commerce, whether for art, for education, or for charity, make a never-ending epic, which chants melodeously to the world the surpassing blessings of peace.

Thus much in proof that my opinions respecting trade are not altogether prejudiced or ex parte ones; as evidence that, if ready to point out and stigmatise its drawbacks and littleness, I am yet not unwilling to do homage to its vast achievements, its undeniable and beneficent services to mankind. I find no fault with the uses of trade, but with its abuses: and affirm that these latter are more likely to become sharply prominent in a democratic society than in any other, and to increase in the ratio of its years of successful establishment; and that, therefore it behooves the thoughtful and the educated, in a community like that of the United States, to take especial pains to combat and forestall its ill effects. It is not the effect of mercantile life as illustrated in the deeds and examples of Lawrences and Astors which is to be dreaded—these are the brilliant exceptions, which can be emulated by few, and which, it is not unjust to say, are conspicuous from their rarity—but it is the truckling, huckstering, shaving practices so eagerly followed by the great mass, and which, in the absence of any other considerable goal for ambition than mere wealth, must continue to entice and suck down the majority to the seductive Maelstrom. It is the peddling, haggling, overreaching spirit, so universally, and not always justly, attributed to the conventional Yankee, which is so degrading, so offensive, and yet so contagious. People questioned my facts, disputed my inferences, when I have said in private as much as this. They urge that in the mother country the dark side of trade is as lowering and repulsive as with themselves: I answer, not altogether so. For whatever the evils and the sorrows and the wrongs which exist in that old land, its people do still care for something besides the mere accumulation of gold: they do demand something more than its mere possession before according their respect. It is hard, however, to induce average Americans to believe or to concede such a distinction. Like Montaigne's secretary, they seem to think it impossible that a man should speak well of another country without hating his own; and their prejudice on such a score stiff as their incredulity. The difference between the money homage in the two countries—which appears to me so obvious as to amount to the merest commonplace, but to which my countrymen for the most part obstinately shut their eyes—seems to lie in this:—in England, where wealth remains in families for generation after generation, their representatives are tolerably certain to be at least educated and refined, and to constitute standards in such respects, if not in those of morality. If people there have fortune, then, it is safe to assume that, in the average, they are fit to mingle with good society. Such is not the case in America, where the nouveaux riches are notably in excess of the haute noblesse, and where, moreover, each starting fortuneless, a vulgar, ignorant, pushing fellow is about as certain to acquire wealth as a refined, educated and deserving gentleman is sure to miss it. For the poor gentleman, indeed, there is no niche in America. I am afraid that he is very much opposed in his inherent nature to the existing social organization. The eagerness with which the poor scribblers and poets of New York strive to scramble and twist themselves into the society of the vulgar rich of the city—what is called in current slang "the shoddy aristocracy"—is at once a sad commentary and a humiliating proof of the truth of what I describe.

Here fortunes are sometimes made in a day, and it is small wonder that the lucky ones give ear to the flatterers who make haste to convince them that it takes no longer to learn how to spend them. It is small wonder, in the all-pervading adoration paid to gold, that men should learn to believe that its possession implies a metamorphosis whereby the coarse and rude are changed in a trice to the gentle and refined. If there can be any mitigation of our regret over the horrors of our civil war, it may well rest on the conviction that it will foster and revivify some qualities which have too long lain dormant. The sacrifice of blood, pitiable as it is, cannot be deemed altogether in vain in a vast community hurrying in a frantic mass to the worship of the most degrading of idols—a community which, if ever such a necessity were indicated, positively required a powerful convulsion from some quarter to clarify its atmosphere, and infuse more wholesome elements into its political and social condition.

PROCLAMATION OF THE PRESIDENT.

Day of Humiliation and Prayer.

WHEREAS, by my proclamation of the 25th inst., Thursday, the 25th day of next month, was recommended as a day for special humiliation and prayer in consequence of the assassination of Abraham Lincoln, late President of the United States; but whereas my attention has been called to the fact that the day aforesaid is sacred to large numbers of Christians as one of rejoicing for the ascension of the Saviour; now, therefore be it known that I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, do hereby suggest that the religious services recommended as aforesaid should be postponed until Thursday, the 1st day of June next.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the City of Washington this 29th day of April, in the year of our Lord 1865, and of the independence of the United States of America the eighty-ninth.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

By the President:
W. HUNTER, Acting-Secretary of State.

NEW BOOKS, MUSIC, &c.

AMONG the latest musical compositions of the amateur order, is "Far Awa," by Adam D. Logan, Esq. It is privately printed, but destined to publicity, not less from its melody than from its elegance of composition. It has a further appeal, that of Nationality, to the numerous sons (and daughters) of Scotia in our fair and regenerated land.

THE MANHATTAN LIFE INSURANCE

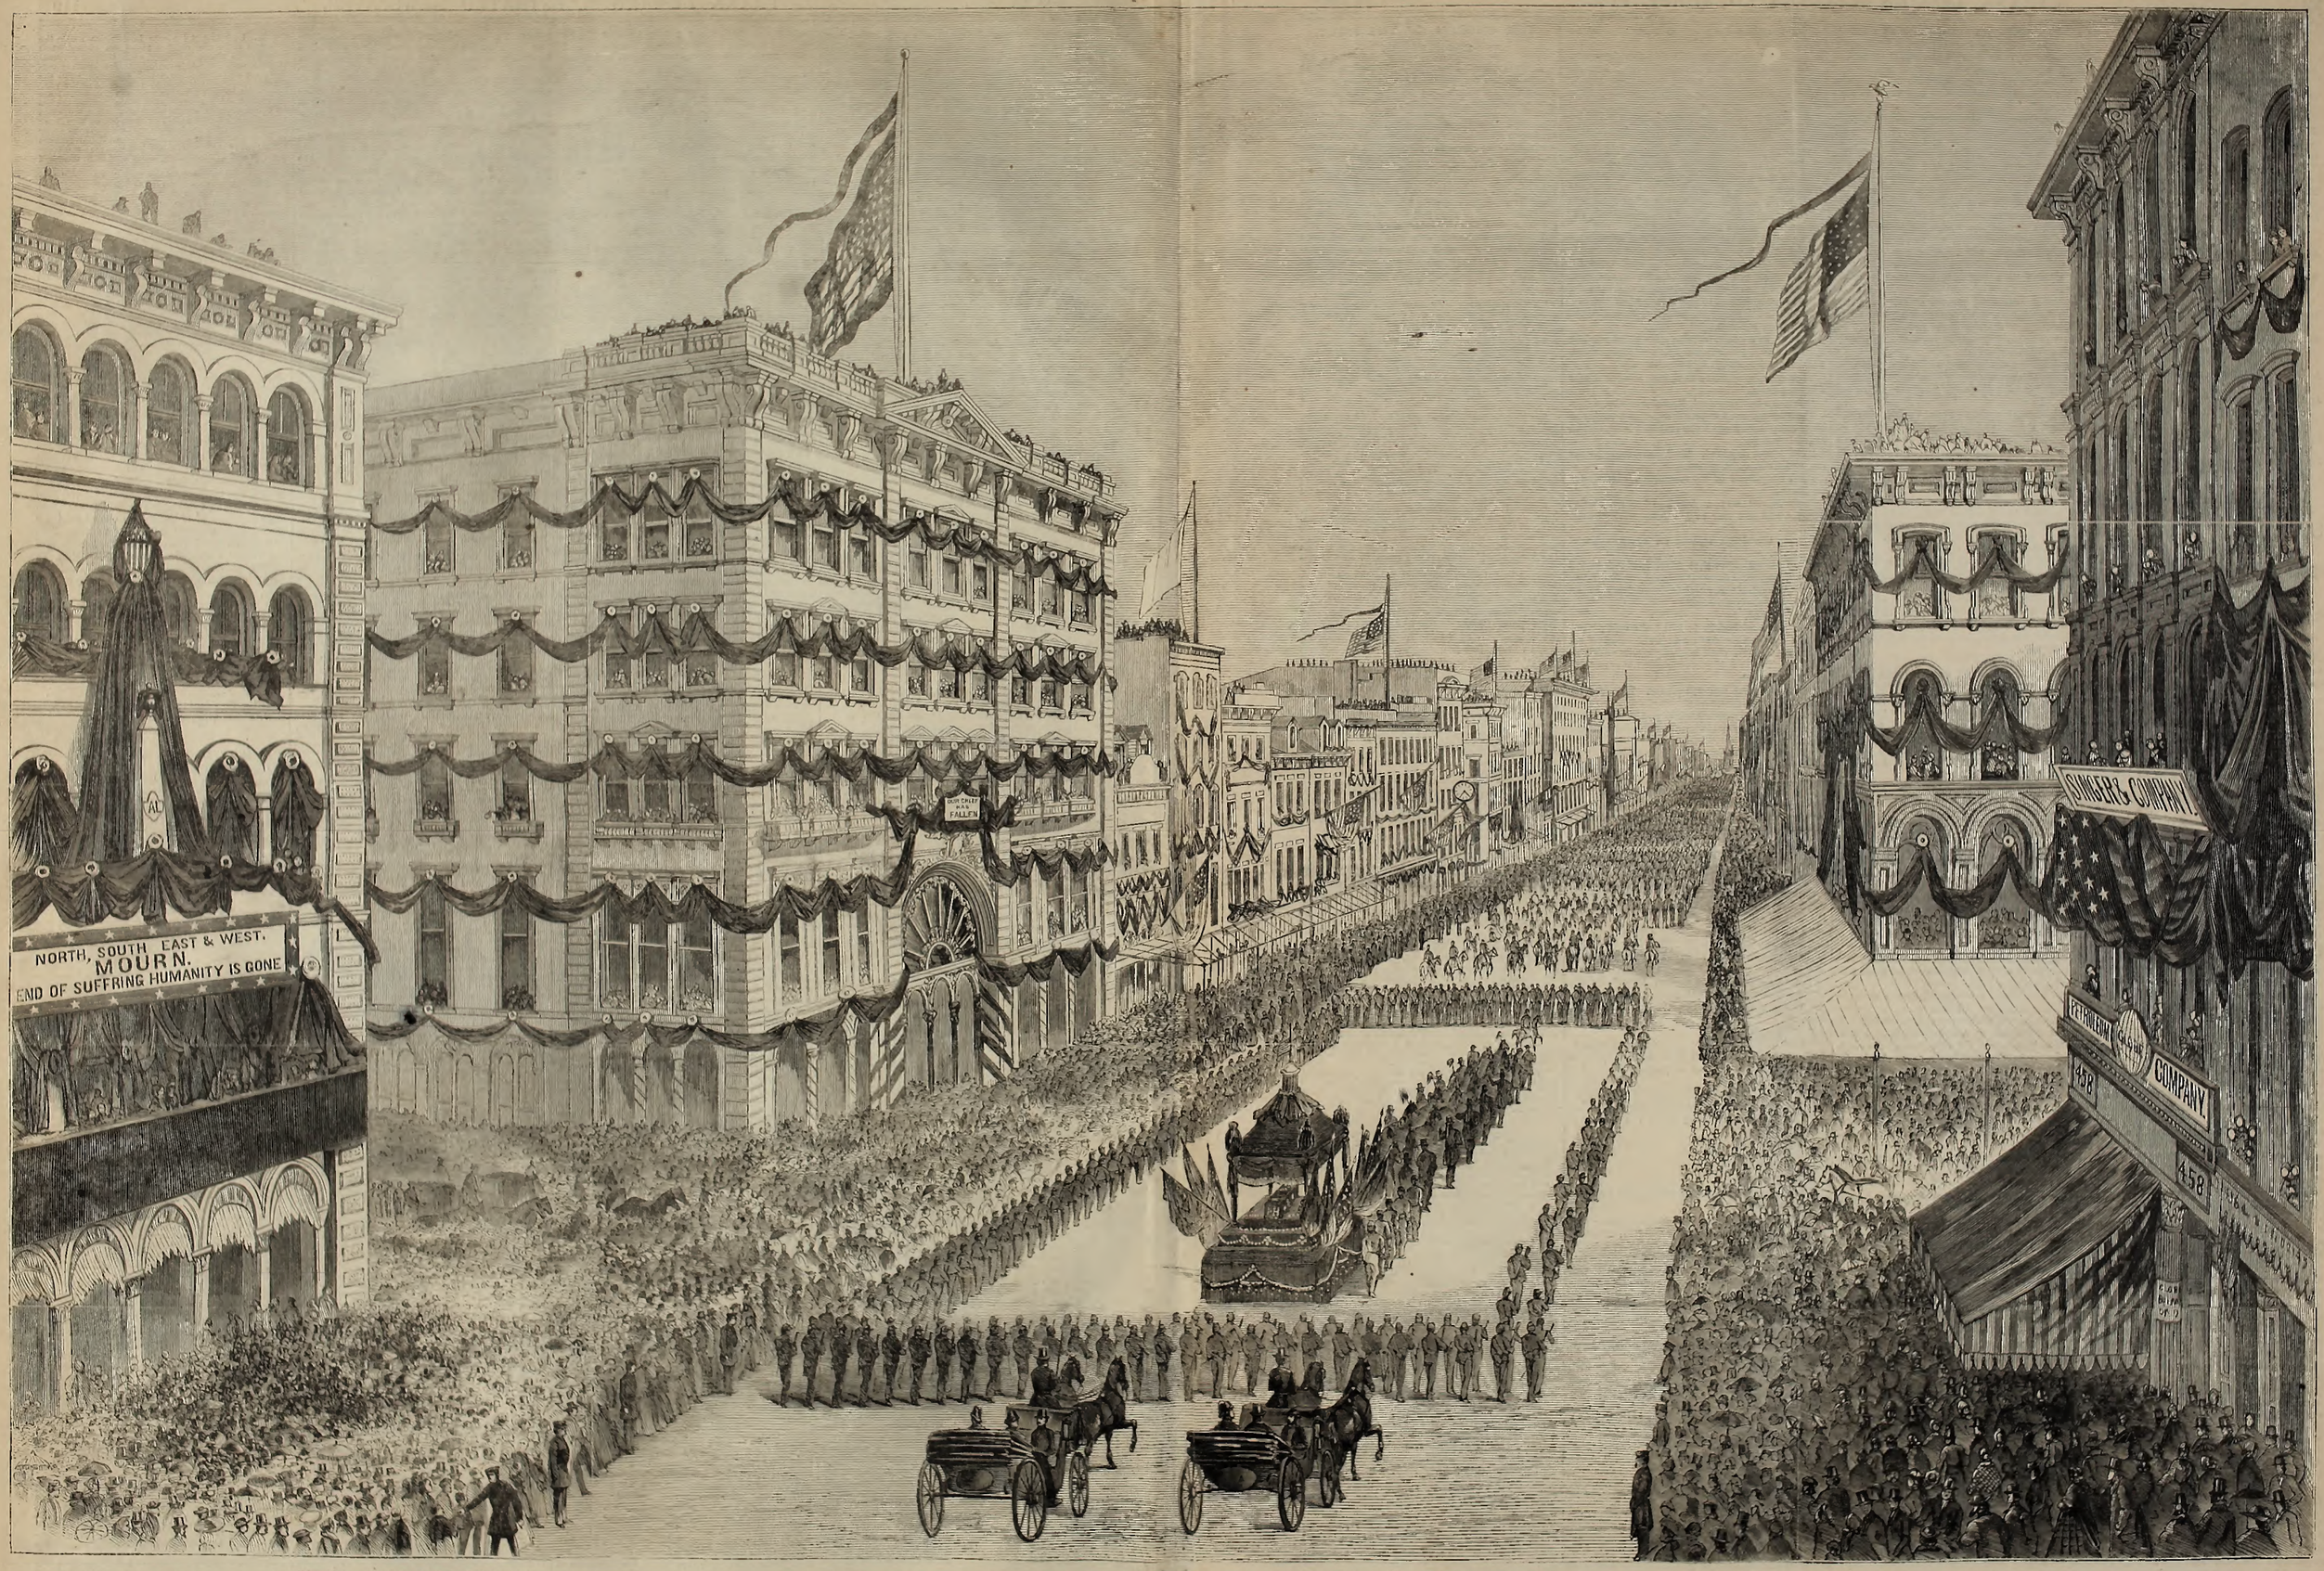
Company's New Building.

THIS building, recently completed, is one of the handsomest in New York. It is of white marble, in the Italian style, and was erected at an expense of one hundred thousand dollars. Situated in Broadway, between Liberty Street and Maiden Lane, it presents an imposing elevation with its fluted Corinthian pilasters and columns, and its semi-circular headed openings and pediments.

The first story is occupied by leading Fire Insurance Companies, on either side of the entrance, and the grand hall of the Manhattan Life Insurance Company at its termination. This hall is 60 feet deep, 40 feet wide, and 26 feet in height, enriched by pilasters, pedestals and entablature of the Corinthian order, surmounted by a covered ceiling, handsomely ornamented and lighted by a dome 20 feet in diameter.

The floor is of marqueterie of rich design, pleasingly inlaid with maple, walnut and other hard woods.

At the end of the apartment is a raised dais, surrounded by an ornamental enclosure, for the president, commanding the entire office. On the right of the entrance is the general agent's compartment, appropriately fitted. The fittings generally are of carved walnut; they include some three hundred drawers, and cost about five thousand dollars.



The physician's room is in close proximity to the president.

The building is of an ell form on plan, and has a front on Liberty street. Here is the directors' room, 40 feet by 18, tastily finished, opening into the large hall. The upper part of the edifice is occupied by insurance, mining and other offices, approached by an elliptical staircase. The lower storey is of iron, with Doric columns, and other prominent insurance companies have their offices on either side. The erection is 140 feet deep and 62 feet high, with sub-cellars to the depth of 18 feet. Mr. J. Butler Snooks, of Chambers Street, is the architect.

The furniture for the directors' room is exceedingly ornate; it was prepared expressly, and is inscribed with the monogram of the company.

DR. AGNEW, of the Sanitary Commission, describes the condition of the Union prisoners sent in to Wilmington from the prison pens of Salisbury:

"Filth, rags, nakedness, starvation were personified in their condition. Many of the men were in a state of mind resembling idiocy, unable to tell their names, and lost to all sense of modesty, unconscious of their nakedness and personal condition. Some of them moving about on their hands and knees, unable to stand upon their gangrenous feet, looking up like hungry dogs beseeching the observer for a bite of bread or a sup of water. Some of them hitched along on their hands, pushing gangrenous feet literally reduced to bone and shreds before them. Others leaned upon staves, and glared from sunken eyes through the parchment-like slits of their open eyelids into space, without having the power to fix an intelligent gaze upon passing objects. Others giggled and smirked and hobbled like starved idiots; while some adamantine figures walked erect, as though they meant to move the skeleton homewards so long as vitality enough remained to enable them to do so. To see the men who remain here in hospital would move a heart as hard and cold as marble. Their condition is that of men who have for months suffered chronic starvation. Their arms and legs look like coarse reeds with bulbous joints. Their faces look as though a skilful taxidermist had drawn tanned skin over the bare skull, and then placed false eyes in the orbital cavities. They defy description. It would take a pen expert in the use of every term known to the anatomist and the physician to begin to expose their fearful condition. May God, in his infinite mercy, forgive the creatures who have done this horrid thing."

FUNERAL HONORS TO PRESIDENT LINCOLN.—THE CATAFALQUE PASSING UP BROADWAY, NEW YORK, APRIL 25, 1865, IN THE PRESENCE OF NEARLY A MILLION SPECTATORS.—FROM A NUMBER OF SKETCHES TAKEN AT DIFFERENT POINTS BY OUR SPECIAL ARTISTS.

PREMONITIONS.

BY J. H. ELLIOT.

I heard a robin this morning,
Low piping to its mate;
And I said—"the spring is dawning,
So heart be still and wait."

The grass in my neighbor's garden
Is flecked with spots of green;
In the air are faint flower odors,
Though the buds are still unseen.

The wild March winds are sweeping
The pent streets through and through;
But the sun is warm at noon-time,
And the sky is deeply blue;

And the snow on the far-off hill-tops,
Grows less and less each day,
While the swift streams in the valleys
Sing its chill blood away.

Bareheaded out in the sunshine
The happy children play,
The first to welcome the spring-time,
With outstretched arms alway.

And the men wear on their faces
A rare unwonted smile,
And their steps grow more elastic,
And their hearts more light the while.

So I say to my heart and its longings,
"Patience—be still and wait,
For the spring is surely coming,
All the brighter for being late."

GUY'S FOLLY;

OR,

The Secret of Thornton Heath.

BY VANE IRETON ST. JOHN.

AUTHOR OF "THE LASS OF RICHMOND HILL," "THE WORLD'S VERDICT," ETC.

CHAPTER V.—"COULD IT BE THAT HER HUSBAND HAD DESCENDED TO SUCH A CRIME?"

In the midst of one of the little scattered groups of trees in the most remote corner of Thornton Heath was an old and deserted well.

Constructed long, long ago, no one knew exactly when, it had fallen into decay; its sides were broken and covered with moss, its mouth overgrown with weeds and rank vegetation.

It had the unmistakable reputation of being haunted, and strange stories were told of pale ghosts and hideous hags seen by its side by belated rustics.

For murder had been done there, and ignorance always couples the supernatural with the criminal.

Many years ago a poor man living in the neighborhood had suddenly become possessed of a large sum of money, and, having no faith in banks, hoarded it all up in his little cottage.

The possession of a large sum naturally produced fear and suspicion, and the poor man hardly dared leave his cottage lest he should be plundered of his treasure.

His days and nights were spent in anxiety, and he constantly kept firearms in his room for the defence of his wealth.

Late one dark and stormy night he was awakened by the sound of some one trying to gain admittance through the little back window.

Cautiously creeping from his bed, pistol in hand, he waited the approach of the intruder.

At length a human form darkened the window—he fired—and with a yell, the supposed midnight robber fell to the ground.

Terror overcame the unhappy shedder of blood, and he hurried to conceal the consequences of his rash act.

On raising his victim from the ground, a low groan warned him that life was not extinct; and he dragged the poor unfortunate man to the well, and rolled him over into the water.

Conscience and the fear of discovery almost drove him mad; and, after a few days, he proceeded to the nearest police station and gave himself up.

The well was searched, the body found—it was his brother.

A trial took place, and the man pleading guilty, was condemned and executed.

The blackened, weather-stained remnants of the gallows still points its bare arms towards the well; and many a tale of terror is told—how one brother rises from the well every night, while the other descends from the gallows—of their meeting and shrieking as they re-enact the deadly scene, and finally disappearing in a whirlwind.

It was, in truth, as lonely, desolate a spot as could be found on all that wide, barren heath.

Few people ever passed that way—none, unless business compelled them to do so. The shepherd seldom led his flock in that direction.

Still more weird and wild it looked by night, when the moon occasionally showed her face in the sea of clouds through which she majestically sailed, throwing glimpses of light over the broad unenclosed tract of waste land.

The wild shriek of the owl, as it winged its heavy flight round the gallows, was the only sound heard, except the shrill whistle of the wind as it swept across the moor.

A pool or pond at some distance from the well was half sheltered on one side by an old tree, which appeared, from the immense size of its hollow trunk, to be a refuge to the wild birds and cattle, which were the usual trespassers on its hospitality.

There was something gnome-like and grotesque in the appearance of its naked spectral branches, which stretched forth like the arms of a man in the attitude of supplication; and the old moss-grown trunk, riven in twain like limbs, seemed to favor the supposition.

It was the only tree visible, with the exception of the stunted firs which were scattered all over the plain.

The dreary heath, the apparent absence of all human life or habitation, the rude features of the surrounding country, the rushy pool with its ghost-like guardian, together made a scene of a most striking desolation; and one might well imagine that the land for miles round was honored with as little of man's care and cultivation as the waste spot which still nourished the venerable knotted roots of that single old tree.

The clouds, which had been gathering all the evening, grew thicker and thicker, and at length the rain began to fall in short and occasional showers, between which the moon broke out, fair and smiling as a beautiful lady after a fall of tears.

In one of these fitful gleams of light, a human figure might have been seen pacing backwards and forwards by the side of the pool.

He wore a hat over his brow, and was closely enveloped in a long cloak.

He seemed a man of bold and fearless temper, for he paced up and down by the haunted spot as though he cared neither for man, nor ghost, nor devil.

The owl came suddenly from behind him, and screamed as it flapped across his path, but he merely smiled as he continued his walk—his nerves were not to be shaken by the bird of night.

The neighboring gallows and its rusty chain clanked and moaned as it swung in the midnight air, but neither sight nor sound appalled him.

He seemed, as he stalked along, more like one of the supernatural beings who were said to haunt the place, than a man of flesh and blood.

Suddenly he stopped.

A sound, as of some one approaching, fell upon his ear; and, after listening for a moment, he disappeared within the hollow tree.

If he had imagined, however, that he would perceive who the new comer was, he was mistaken.

The sounds of approaching steps came nearer and nearer, and seemed to pass along the edge of the dark pool.

But he saw no one.

Presently—startled and even terrified by the strangeness of the occurrence—he left his hiding-place, and walked boldly out into the moonlight.

But still he could perceive no one; up and down the road there was no sign of a human being; and shivering—not from cold, for the night was warm, though showery, but from deadly dread—he returned once more to his hiding-place near the well.

Before explaining who this man was, and what his purpose in thus concealing himself, I must return for a time to Ella Raymond.

She had taken Gideon Crawleigh's advice.

Not one word of Sir Arthur Arbuthnot's behavior had she breathed to her husband, nor one word as to Walter's mysterious conduct towards Rose Florey.

Yet it was a hard task.

Each moment in these two weary days she had felt her heart bursting with the desire to speak to him—to entreat him to clear away the doubts which clouded her spirit and obscured her happiness.

Better far would it have been had she done so.

Better far to chance the storm when there was a chance, too, of a calm.

Better far to face any tempest of the moment than risk an estrangement for ever.

But the advice of Gideon Crawleigh was definite.

It was given, too, as a friend—given in such a manner that she could not well gainsay the truth of his words—given insidiously, as he always did give advice; and he had contrived thoroughly to convince Ella that in this case, if in no other, he was acting uprightly.

On the evening of the second day, as she was crossing the drawing-room, a piece of paper on the floor attracted her attention, and she picked it up.

It contained but few words, but these words to her were full of significance.

They ran thus:

"Meet me to-night, at the old well, at the end of Thornton Heath, near Guy's Folly. Be there at nine o'clock. I have much to tell you.
"Rose Florey."

The pallor of death overspread Ella's features.

What could this mean?

There was no doubt that these words were addressed to her husband; if, at any other time, she would have been inclined to doubt it, his conduct at Lady Arbuthnot's ball tended to confirm her suspicion now.

Walter to meet her at nine o'clock at Purford's Well, and for what purpose?

She sank down upon the couch, pale and trembling, to think; but she was not long in coming to a decision.

The note was dated that day; that very night was the rendezvous.

Her mind, therefore, was at once made up.

She, too, would be at the rendezvous, and hear all that passed.

When night came, therefore, she dressed herself in dark clothes, so as to be as little noticeable as possible, and went out without telling either her husband or her servant that she was going.

She reached the place a little before the appointed time, and saw the figure of a man pacing to and fro near the well.

With a throbbing heart she hurried forward; but as she neared him, the moon fell upon his face.

Then she saw it was not her husband, but Gideon Crawleigh.

A strange suspicion invaded her heart.

Could Gideon Crawleigh be aiding her husband in deceiving her; and could he be striving, by telling her of his deception, to create a breach between them?

There was no time for reflection now, however.

The next move was to conceal herself from observation; and the moon, just then gliding behind a cloud, gave her ample opportunity for so doing.

So darting along the rough grass, she hid behind a large tree; and Gideon Crawleigh, when the moon shone again, saw no one.

Ella Raymond felt very desolate, and very doubtful as to the propriety of her mission.

Might not her husband even now be at home, wondering at her absence?

Might he not discover where she had been, and justly accuse her of suspicions—groundless, and proving absence of true love for him.

The place, too, was not one to induce pleasing thoughts.

The sky lowered dismally—the wind howled—the trees swayed and rustled, and the chains on the gallows near clanked gloomily, and caused a shiver ever and anon to run through her frame.

Presently her thoughts, however, were diverted into another channel.

A step was heard coming along the road—a light female form hurried up, and Rose Florey and Gideon Crawleigh met near the well.

They were so close to Ella, that she could hear all that passed.

"You are not punctual, Rose," said Crawleigh.

She was supposed to be a lady—was a visitor at Lady Arbuthnot's—and she met him here, and he called her Rose!

"No, I was detained. Sir Arthur came to see me, and I could not get away."

Ella's suspicions of the few nights before were confirmed.

Rose Florey was a friend of the libertine baronet, and her fear at his presence had been assumed.

Gideon Crawleigh uttered an exclamation of annoyance.

"You always allow that fellow to stand in the way of your best interests," he said. "Sir Arthur is a wretched little mountebank, and deserves the contempt of every woman."

Rose laughed.

"He is a wretched little fool," she said; "but then I am playing my cards well. Before six months are over I shall be Lady Arthur Arbuthnot."

"If I please."

"Yes—yes; but you will please. However, let me tell you my news."

"I hope it is important, since you have dragged me out to this miserable place at this hour of the night."

"It is indeed important," she answered. "At least you will say so, since it affects your own liberty."

"My liberty!" cried Crawleigh, laughing. "I had no idea I was so near prison."

"You are, then, nearer than you conceive. That cheque you gave me, drawn on Tillotson's bank, was returned to me yesterday, marked 'forged.'"

Gideon Crawleigh sprang back a step in surprise.

Rose Florey laughed.

"Don't act, Gideon," she said. "I suppose you will expect me to believe that you know nothing of this?"

"I swear it."

"Nonsense! Now don't let's lose time by taking or hearing oaths like that. I understand very well——"

"In this case you are wrong, Rose," he answered, earnestly. "That cheque was given to me as real; and given me, too, by Walter Raymond."

"Is it possible?"

"I can prove it. He has been in great difficulties lately, you know; and if he does try to fly a kite now and then it is not surprising."

Ella shuddered.

Was it possible that Walter was guilty?

"And how am I in danger?" asked Crawleigh.

"The officers are coming down to me about it to-morrow."

"And you?"

"Must give you up."

"You are joking."

"Indeed I am not."

"You mean to tell me deliberately you will give me up to justice?"

"Certainly; you gave me the cheque—why should I suffer for your misdeeds? I, too, who am just on the point of becoming Lady Arbuthnot? No, no, Gideon Crawleigh, I am not poor-spirited enough to allow myself to be played upon like that. There is only one method to avoid being shamefully compromised, and that is to pay in full."

"And when?"

"To-morrow."

"And why did not this meeting take place at your own house?"

Rose laughed.

"Because if it had been so I should have been compromising myself. Come, is it to be as I say?"

"Yes; Walter Raymond is too good a friend to give up."

"To-morrow, then, at twelve, I expect you. The amount is two hundred."

"Good. I will be there."

They then shook hands and parted, while Ella, sick at heart and weary, and terror-stricken at what she had heard, departed homewards.

Could it be true that her husband had descended to such a crime?

There lately died in Buenos Ayres a man of 78 years, whose will contained a clause leaving 10,000 cigars for those who might attend his funeral. The eccentric testator also expressed his desire that his friends should not leave the house of mourning without drinking to his memory all the wine left in his cellar. It is said that the wish of the deceased was perfectly fulfilled.

THE CHURCH OF THE HOLY SEPULCHRE.

A remarkable document has been published within the last few weeks, which places the Empress Eugénie in the category of royal authors; she has addressed a letter to all the Catholic Princesses of Europe on the subject of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem. The Empress does not exactly propose a crusade to rescue the Holy Places from the hand of the infidel, but her proposition will be hardly less startling to the faithful—for it amounts not merely to reparation of the fabric, but to its demolition and reconstruction, after a plan of her own. We have not yet heard what reception the Empress's letter has received at the hands of her royal and imperial sisters, but it is to be hoped that some of these ladies will be found ready to protest against this very ambitious design. For is it not ambition surpassing even that of her husband? Louis Napoleon is content to trace his name in characters of stone across the map of Paris, but nothing less than the Holy City and the Church of the Holy Sepulchre will satisfy the pious aspirations of the devout Eugénie. Here is her letter in its integrity:

"Travellers to the Holy Land have been for many years astonished at the state of dilapidation presented by the dome surmounting the Holy Sepulchre. They naturally ask how it is that the Christian Powers have not long since put a stop to a state of things so shocking to all Christians. The real reason, it must be confessed, is that the Holy Land, though dyed with the blood of our Saviour, and the cradle of a religion which inculcates toleration, peace, and goodwill, is the scene of petty jealousies between the different sects of Christians—jealousies which have at length ripenened into serious quarrels.

"The dome was formerly built by the Latin Christians, who adorned it with emblems and inscriptions denoting the preference they then enjoyed in the occupation of the Church. In 1808, however, it was burnt down, and circumstances having given to the Greeks at that moment a certain preponderance in Palestine, they profited by their position so far as to rebuild the dome, to the exclusion of the Latins, and in their turn covered the structure with inscriptions in their own tongue and extracted from their liturgy.

"The two parties now find themselves face to face. On the one hand, the Latins claim to have rebuilt the dome as it was before the fire of 1808; on the other, the Greeks assert that its reconstruction gave them a right of possession, or some other claim which they call an 'acquired right.' The great Powers of France and Russia, with a feeling which does them honor, are desirous to put a stop to these deplorable contentions. After an understanding, first between themselves, and then with the Turkish Government, a protocol was signed at Constantinople on the 5th September last, recording the agreement of the three Powers, and naming the conditions on which common action might be taken in rebuilding the dome. When, however, the plans for the reconstruction had been made, and the time for action arrived, and it was necessary to put an exact interpretation on certain doubtful expressions in the protocol, fresh dissensions were engendered by the local jealousies, and the result is that nothing has been done and all is again in confusion. Meantime the dome is daily falling further and further into decay, the safety of the pilgrims who flock to the Sepulchre is endangered, and the inconvenience is ripening into a grave scandal. How is such a state of things to be put to an end to? It was a pious princess, St. Helena, the mother of Constantine, who, at the beginning of the fourth century, demolished the Pagan Temple which covered the grotto of the Holy Sepulchre, and constructed in its place the original sanctuary over the tomb of Christ. Why should not the princesses of all the Christian States follow the brilliant example of St. Helena, and come to such an understanding as should enable them, under conditions worthy of their position and of their common Christianity, to carry out an object which has hitherto baffled all the efforts of diplomacy? Standing outside the arena of politics, and ignoring all religious differences, they would speak in the name of Christian piety and charity alone, and thus would appeal to the faithful of the whole Christian world on an object equally dear to all, and in a voice to which none could fail to respond.

"But if the work is to be worthy of the spirit of Christian conciliation which inspires it, it must not be limited to the mere repair of the dome. The object must be, with the consent of the Sublime Porte, to rebuild the entire Church of the Sepulchre on a new plan, on a larger scale, and in such a manner, that it shall be able to accommodate all the communions. Thus, there would be a chapel, or even an aisle, for the Latins, and the same on the other side for the Greeks. The central nave would be common to all, and access to the Sepulchre itself, now so difficult, and often the occasion of such unseemly strife, would be thrown completely open. The new church, should, as far as possible, be in keeping with the grandeur of the associations of the sacred spots beneath its roof. With this view the architects and artists of all countries should be invited to compete, and their designs should be submitted to an international jury, with instructions to select the one which from a purely artistic point of view should be the noblest in conception.

"The cost of completing the new Church of the Holy Sepulchre at the earliest possible moment might be met by a general subscription, at the head of which every Christian princess will no doubt be too anxious to place her name."

Easter Eggs.—"Grace," asks for information about "Pace eggs."

Of eggs they brought her number nine,
All nicely marked and colored fine;
One was blacker than the sloe,
Another white as driven snow;
Red, crimson, purple, azure blue,
Green, pink, and yellow rose to view.
She closely peeled them one by one,
Broke this and that till all were done,
Then shrugged her shoulders, waved her head,
But not one syllable she said.

The old-fashioned way of preparing these eggs is as follows:—Immerse the eggs in hot water for a few minutes, then inscribe the names of individuals, dates, &c., on the shell with the end of a common tallow-candle—the warmth of the egg renders this easy. Thus inscribed, place them in a pan of hot water, saturated with cochineal or other dye-woods; the parts over which the tallow has been passed being quite impervious to the operation of the dye, the eggs come out of the pan presenting white inscriptions on colored grounds. There is, however, another, neater though more laborious way of preparing "Pace eggs." Dye the shells, then decorate them prettily by means of a pen-knife, with which the dye may be scraped off, and the effect will be the same as in the case of the tallow—a white design on a colored ground. I have seen some very pretty landscapes made in this way. An egg boiled within the coat of an onion will turn a beautiful brown color, but I do not really know the preparations specially used to obtain a good blue dye.

An imaginative contributor professes to have discovered somewhat singular evidence of the superior gallantry of our early ancestors over their immediate successors, and the revival of a respect for women in a still later age. "I have observed," he says, "that on most of the engraved brass-plates laid over gravestones, where they represent a man and his wife, among the ancient ones, the lady takes the right hand of her husband; but in those of more modern date, the husband lies on the right of his wife." The "reason why" of this change, he explains by adding that "when the high honors paid to the fair sex began to go out of fashion, the husbands seized the opportunity to assert their superiority, and their wives were removed from the place of honor which the male sex for many years maintained." Subsequently, as he tells us, this outrageous wrong was, in some degree, redressed, seeing that "all public addresses to a mixed assembly of both sexes, till sixty years ago, commenced, 'Gentlemen and Ladies!' while, at present it is 'Ladies and Gentlemen!'"

NOT YET.

Not yet—along the purpling sky
We see the dawning ray;
But leagues of cloudy distance lie
Between us and the sky.

Not yet—the aloe waits serene
Its promised advent hour;
A patient century of green
For one full perfect flower.

Not yet—no harvest song is sung
In the sweet ear of spring;
Nor hear we, while the blade is young,
The reaper's sickle swing.

Not yet—before the crown the cross;
The struggle ere the prize;
Before the gain the fearful loss;
The death ere Paradise.

CHAPTER XX.—AN EXPLANATION.

Francis Tredethlyn, now so frequent a visitor at the Cedars, happened to present himself there upon the day after that on which Maude had come to an understanding with her father. The young man rode down to Twickenham in the afternoon, and found Miss Hillary occupied with two croquet-playing young ladies and a croquet-playing young gentleman, whose manners and opinions were of the same insipidly flaxen hue as their hair and eyebrows.

There was a tired look in Maude's face that afternoon, which was very perceptible to Francis Tredethlyn, although quite invisible to the neutral-tinted croquet-players. Her eyes wandered away sometimes from the balls and mallets, and fixed themselves, with a sad, dreamy look, upon the sunlit river or the distant woodland. Francis saw this, and that faithful Cornish heart grew heavy in sympathy with Miss Hillary's unknown trouble. There must be a little of the Newfoundland dog in the nature of a man who can love hopelessly, a little of that superhuman fidelity, a little of that canine endurance which has inspired so many odious comparisons, to the disparagement of the inferior animal called man. Francis Tredethlyn's eyes followed Miss Hillary with a doglike patience all this afternoon, during which he established himself in the estimation of the flaxen-haired droppers-in as one of the vilest of croquet-players and worst mannered of men.

But the croquet-players departed, after taking tea out of a very ugly Queen Anne teapot and some old Sèvres cups and saucers, which had been bought for Miss Hillary, at the sale of a defunct collector's goods and chattels at Messrs. Christie and Manson's. Francis stayed to dinner, and dined alone with Maude and her father, and found very little to say for himself. He was distracted by the sight of Maude's pale face and sadly thoughtful eyes. How changed she was from the bright and sparkling creature whom he remembered a few months ago in that house! How changed! What was the secret trouble which had worked that transformation? What could it be except Miss Hillary's sorrow for the circumstances that divided her from her distant lover? There could be no other cause for her unhappiness, since her father's commercial difficulties had been smoothed by that twenty thousand pounds so freely advanced to him; and it never occurred to Francis that Maude Hillary could possibly give herself any uneasiness about that money, so lightly parted from by him, nor could he think that any new trouble threatened the merchant's peace, for Mr. Hillary was specially gay and pleasant this evening.

After dinner Maude strolled out into the garden, and down to that delicious terrace by the river, where the big stone vases of geraniums looked dark and grim in the twilight. She walked slowly up and down the long esplanade with a filmy lace handkerchief tied coquettishly over her head, and her long muslin dress sweeping and rustling after her like the draperies of a fashionably attired ghost. Francis Tredethlyn furtively watched that white-robed figure in the shadowy distance as he sat at the dinner-table with Mr. Hillary, and would fain have left his glass, filled with the merchant's rarest Burgundy, for a stroll by the quiet river. Perhaps Mr. Hillary perceived this, for he presently gave the young man his release.

"Since you don't drink your wine, you may as well go for a stroll in the garden, Tredethlyn," he said, good-naturedly. "I see Maude yonder, and she'll be better company for you than I am."

Francis was by no means slow to take this hint. But once outside the dining-room windows, he went very slowly to the terrace on which Maude was walking. He walked in and out among the flower-beds, making a faint pretence of admiring nature in this twilight aspect. He stopped to caress one of Maude's Skye terriers. The animals were very fond of him now that he had learned to avoid that trampling on their toes which had been one of the earlier manifestations of his devotion to Miss Hillary. He loitered here and there on every possible pretext, and at last approached the fair deity in the muslin dress with very much the air of a schoolboy, who presents himself in that awful audience-chamber wherein a grim pedagogue is wont to pronounce terrible judgments upon youthful offenders.

He did not know that Miss Hillary had been expecting him all this time; and that her special purpose was to bring him to her side upon that solitary terrace walk, where she could talk to him freely without fear of eavesdroppers. He did not know that he was quite as much expected as the schoolboy who has been summoned to the parlor, and was to receive a sentence as terrible.

Maude welcomed him very graciously, and for a little while they strolled side by side, talking of the summer's night, and the flowers, and Skye terriers, and canary birds, and other subjects equally commonplace and harmless. Then they came to a stop, mechanically, as it is in the nature of people to do when they walk by the side of a river, and looked over the stone balustrade into the still water. And then a deathlike silence came down upon them; and Maude Hillary felt that the time had come in which she must utter whatever she had it in her mind to say. It was difficult to begin; but then all her duties of late had been difficult; and upon her knees the night before, in the midst of tearful prayers and meditations, she had resolved that there should be no more sailing under false colors as regarded this young man.

"Dear Mr. Tredethlyn," she began at last, "you have been so good to my father, so good to me—for to serve him is to render a double service to me—you have been so kind and generous a friend, that I have grown to think of you and trust you almost as I might if you had been my brother."

Poor Francis listened to this exordium with a very despondent air. Inexperienced as he was in the ways of the world, he was wise enough to know that there was nothing hopeful in such an address as this. When a young lady tells a gentleman that she can regard him as a brother, it is the plainest possible declaration that he can never be anything else. In this case it seemed an uncalled-for act of cruelty, for the Cornishman had never deluded himself by any false hope.

"I think of you almost as if you were my brother," Maude went on, with heartless repetition of the obnoxious word; "and I cannot help thinking, dear Mr. Tredethlyn, that you are scarcely employing your life as wisely or as well as you might. I don't think you were ever intended to be an idle man; and, again, with such a fortune as yours, a man has scarcely the right to be idle. There are so many people who may be benefited by a rich man's active life. Oh, forgive me, if I seem to lecture you. You will laugh at me, perhaps, and think I want to set myself up as a strong-minded woman, a political economist, or something of that kind. But I only venture to speak to you because I think you waste so much of your time down here, playing billiards with the empty-headed young men who haunt this place, and lounging in the drawing-room to hear the frivolous talk of half-a-dozen idle women, myself among the number."

She spoke lightly, but she was not the less earnest in her intention, she was only travelling gradually round to the point she wanted to reach.

"But I am so happy here," cried Francis Tredethlyn. "Ah, if you knew how I have tried to stop away—if you could only know what happiness it is to me to come—"

Maude Hillary interrupted him hastily.

"Yes, I know it is a pleasant life in its way," she said, "very pleasant and very useless. It is a little new to you perhaps, and seems pleasanter to you on that account. But if you knew what dreary work it is to look back at a long summer season of operas, and concerts, and horticultural meetings, and boat races, and not to be able to remember one action worthy of being recorded in all that time! I am getting very tired of my present life, Mr. Tredethlyn. It has ceased to be pleasant to me ever since I have known of papa's difficulties. It is altogether unsuited to me; for I am engaged to marry a poor man who would bitterly feel the burden of an expensive wife."

The bolt was launched, and Miss Hillary expected to see some evidence that it had gone home to its mark. But Francis Tredethlyn made no sign. There was just a little pause, and then he said very quietly:

"Yes, I know that you are to marry a poor man, but with such a wife a man could scarcely remain poor. I suppose it's only an ignorant, foolish notion, but I can't help thinking that for the sake of the woman he loves, any man could cut his way to fortune. I can always believe in those knights of the olden time, who used to put a badge in their helmets, and then ride off to the wars to do all sorts of miraculous things; and I fancy it must be the same now-a-days, somehow, and that a man who loves truly, and is truly loved again, can achieve anything."

Maude was inexpressibly relieved by this speech.

"You know of my engagement, then?" she said.

"Yes, I have known it for a very long time."

"Ah, of course, Julia told you?"

"Yes, it was Miss Desmond who told me."

"She had a perfect right to do so; there was no reason for any secrecy in the matter. I am very glad that you have known of it. You are so kind a friend that I should not like you to be ignorant of anything nearly relating to my father or myself."

"It is very good of you to call me a friend," Francis answered. It seemed to him as if some angelic creature was stooping from her own proper sphere to place herself for a brief interval by his side. "It is very good of you to take any interest in my welfare, and I feel that you are right. The life I lead is utterly idle and useless, but it shall be so no longer. Your father has very generously offered me a grand opportunity of turning both my time and money to account."

"My father! But how?"

"He has offered me a partnership in his own house."

"A partnership—a partnership in his difficulties—his liabilities?" cried Maude, in a tone of horror.

"Those difficulties were only temporary. The thirty thousand I advanced have wiped out all liabilities, and your father's business stands on a firmer basis than ever."

"Thirty thousand! You have lent papa thirty thousand pounds?"

"I have not lent it, my dear Miss Hillary. I have only invested it in your father's business. There is no obligation in the matter, believe me; or if there is, it is all on my side. I get a higher rate of interest for my money than I should get elsewhere."

He stopped suddenly, for Maude had burst into a passion of sobs.

"Oh, how could he do it? How could he?" she cried. "How could papa take so mean an advantage of your generosity? I love him so dearly, that it almost kills me to think that he should be base or dishonorable. I thought the twenty thousand pounds would soon be paid, and instead of that he has borrowed more money of you."

"My dear Miss Hillary, pray do not distress yourself. Believe me you misunderstand this business altogether. It is not a loan. It is only an equitable and friendly arrangement, quite as advantageous to me as to your father. Upon my word of honor you do Mr. Hillary a cruel wrong when you imagine otherwise."

Maude dried her tears, and listened to the voice of her consoler. She was so anxious to think well of her father, that she must have been something more than an ignorant, inexperienced girl, if she shut her ears to Francis Tredethlyn's arguments.

Those arguments were very convincing, very specious. Maude ought, perhaps, to have perceived that they were not the original ideas of Mr. Tredethlyn. She ought, perhaps, to have discovered the parrot-like nature of his discourse respecting all the grand prospects of the house of Hillary and Co.; but she wanted to think well of her father, and Francis Tredethlyn urged her to that conclusion. She listened to his discourse as eagerly as if he had been the most eloquent of living creatures. She felt a kind of tender friendship for him as he talked to her; never before had he seemed so nearly on a level with herself. She wanted to believe in his wisdom; she wanted to respect his sense and judgment, because he was the defender of her father, that beloved father against whom her own conscience had so lately arisen a stern and pitiless judge.

The quiet river rippled under the summer moonlight before Maude and her companion left the terrace, so much had Francis found to say about the house of Hillary and Co., and the wonderful advantages that must come to him from a partnership in that great firm. Surely his enthusiasm must have arisen from some vague idea that even that commercial alliance would be some kind of link between Miss Hillary and himself. He talked very freely to-night, for Maude's confidence had set him at his ease, and in almost every word he uttered he naively revealed some new depth in his devoted love.

Late that night, when the Cornishman had gone away, Maude stood at her open window, looking out at the river, and thinking of all that Francis Tredethlyn had said to her.

"Harcourt Lowther never loved me as this man loves me," she thought sadly. "Ah, what a pity that there should be so much wasted love and devotion in the world!"

And then the thought of Francis Tredethlyn's thirty thousand pounds arose in her mind—a terrible obligation, a heavy burden of debt—a debt that was perhaps never to be cancelled.

CHAPTER XXI.—HARCOURT LOWTHER'S WELCOME.

Within a month from that night on which the merchant's daughter and Francis Tredethlyn had lingered so long together on the terrace up the river, Maude Hillary sat at her desk in the little study, trying to begin the most difficult letter she had ever had occasion to write.

The letter was to be addressed to Harcourt Lowther, and the three words, "My dear Harcourt," were already written on the rose-tinted foreign note-paper; but beyond those preliminary words Maude found it very difficult to proceed.

That which she had to tell the distant soldier, sorely tried by inglorious idleness in a penal settlement, and inclined to resent every stroke of ill-fortune, was by no means a pleasant thing to tell. She had to announce to him that the promise she had made long ago in the twilight by the river had been deliberately broken. She had to tell him that she was the plighted wife of another man; and she was not free to reveal to him any one of the strange circumstances that had pressed so cruelly upon her, pushing her, little by little, into this renunciation of her first and only love.

It was only a very commonplace letter that Miss Hillary could write to her discarded lover. She could only tell the old, common story, and put in the hackneyed pleas, so often heard in the court of Cupid—her father's wishes; her desire to secure his happiness rather than her own; and then a wild, womanly prayer for pity; an entreaty that her lover would believe in the existence of stronger reasons—higher motives—the nature of which she was not free to reveal. And last of all, after many pages of passionate supplication for pardon, with not a little violation of the nicer laws propounded by Lindley Murray and his successors—at the very last there came one page blotted with tears, earnest yet incoherent, in which Miss Hillary implored Mr. Lowther to forget her, and to seek happiness with a happier woman. Never had she loved him so dearly as while she wrote that last page, in which she resigned him for ever. Surely Queen Guinevere's diamonds must have sparkled their very brightest just in that one angry moment in which she flung them into the river.

Yes, it had come this. Maude Hillary, like a modern Iphigenia, had sacrificed herself for the benefit of her father. The burden of that debt which had been incurred by her agency had weighed too heavily upon her girlish breast. Somehow or other Francis Tredethlyn must be paid; and since he loved her so devotedly, so foolishly—since he held her as the brightest treasure to be won by aspiring man—it was surely better that he should take this poor recompense than go altogether unrewarded. It may be that Maude Hillary would under no circumstances deliberately have broken faith with her betrothed lover. But these grand crises, upon which the fate of a lifetime may depend, are apt to come very suddenly upon us. The great floodtide of fate arises, and carries away the weak creatures afloat on its resistless waters. A moment of hesitation—a few faltering words—half doubtful, half imploring, and the thing is done.

It had all happened on the day on which Francis Tredethlyn accepted Mr. Hillary's magnanimous offer, and allowed himself to be created a sleeping partner in the Australian house. It was only natural that on such a day Francis should dine at the Cedars; and it was only natural that Lionel Hillary should make a little speech about the the young man, telling his daughter of the generosity of this noble-minded Cornishman, who had been something more than a son to him—a friend, a benefactor, a preserver. What praise could be loud enough for a man who would lend thirty thousand pounds without security? And then this noble-minded Cornishman, whose heart, like a great lump of tinder—only wanting the feeblest spark to kindle it into a blaze—burst out into a passionate declaration of his love. What was his fortune but so much dirt, which he was only too glad to fling under the feet of Miss Hillary? Would he not go out into world to-morrow, penniless, barefooted, a beggar, if by so doing he could add to her happiness? He asked a few such questions as these; and then cried out suddenly that he was a despicable wretch, and that that he was ashamed of himself for saying all this, when he knew that Miss Hillary's heart was given to another man. He would go, he said; she she should never again be tormented by him. She should not be annoyed by so much as the mention of his name. After which passionate speech Mr. Tredethlyn grasped the merchant's hand, and then made a rush towards the door. He would fain have suited the action to the word; he wanted to go away that moment, and hide himself for ever from Maude Hillary. But before he could reach the door Maude was by his side, with her hands clasped about his arm, her face looking upward at his, and drowned with tears.

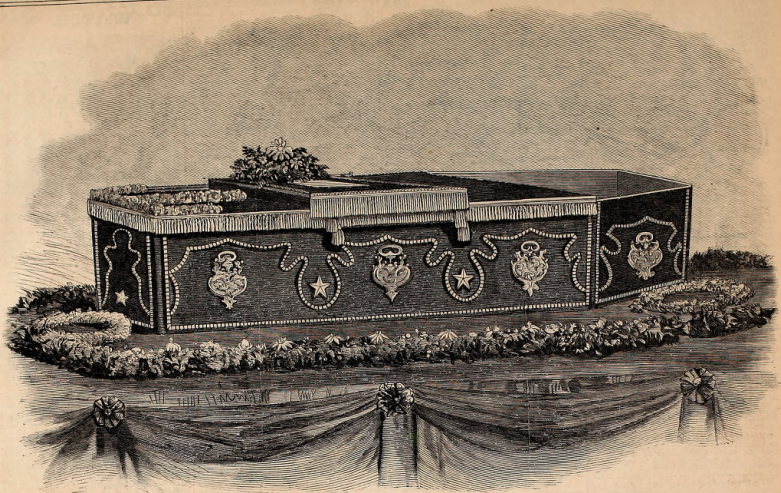
"How good you are!" she cried. "Don't go away; we cannot part from you like this. You have been so good to my father. Ah, how can we ever recompense so much devotion! If my esteem—my gratitude—can make you happy, they are yours, they have long been yours. I renounce every other thought, every other duty. I can have no duty higher than this."

The last words were almost stifled on her lips, for Francis Tredethlyn caught her to his breast as passionately as in that last scene of the "Lady of Lyons."

"Maude, my love—my angel—you will renounce, for my sake—you—you—will be my own—my wife?" he gasped, incoherently. "No—no, I cannot accept such a sacrifice—I am not so mean—so selfish, as to—"

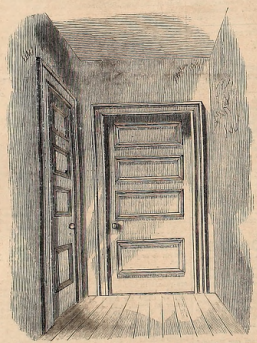
But Mr. Hillary, hovering over his daughter and the generous-minded young Cornishman, would not allow Francis to finish this sentence.

"My dear boy!" he exclaimed—"my darling Maude! nothing upon earth could give me greater pleasure than this, because I know that it is for your mutual happiness. What joy can be deeper or purer than that of a father who knows that his child has won for herself the devoted affection of a good man?"



"And the thirty thousand pounds will be sunk for ever and ever in the firm of Hillary & Co.," the merchant may have thought at the close of that enthusiastic address.

Thus it was that Maude Hillary arrived at the very point towards which fate and her father had been pushing her for the last twelve months. After that passionate impulse of self-sacrifice had passed away, a dull, dead feeling of pain took possession of her breast. Alone in the quiet of her own pretty rooms; alone through the long sunny July mornings with her books, and Berlin wool work, and piano, she had only too much time to consider the step she had taken; she had only too much time to think of her broken vows, her scattered hopes. And she did think of these things—with cruel remorse and self-upbraiding, with bitter and unavailing regret.



The Rapidity of Growth in Fungi.—Mr. Ward, in his work "On the Growth of Plants in closely-glazed Cases," says of it: "I had been struck with the published accounts of the extraordinary growth of Phallus impudicus. I therefore procured three or four specimens in an undeveloped state, and placed them in tesmall glazed case. All but one grew during my temporary absence from home. I was determined not to lose sight of the last specimen; and observing one evening that there was a small rent in the volva, indicating the approaching development of the plant, I watched it all night, and at eight o'clock in the morning the summit of the pileus began to push through the jelly-matter with which it was surrounded. In the course of 25 minutes it shot up three inches, and attained its full elevation of four inches in one hour and a half. Marvellous are the accounts of the rapid growth of cells in the fungi; but, in the above instance, it cannot for a moment be imagined that there was any increase in the number of cells, but merely an elongation of the erectile tissue of the plant." The force developed by this rapid growth and increase of the cells of fungi is truly astonishing. Monsieur Bulliard relates that, on placing a fungus within a glass vessel, the plant expanded so rapidly that it shivered the glass to pieces, with an explosive detonation as loud as that of a pistol; while Dr. Carpenter, in his "Elements of Physiology," mentions that, "in the neighborhood of Basingstoke, a paving-stone, measuring 21 inches square, and weighing 83 pounds, was completely raised an inch an a half out of its bed by a mass of toad-stools, of from six to seven inches in diameter; nearly the whole pavement of the town being heaved up by the same cause." Every one has heard of the portentous growth of the fungi in a gentleman's cellar, produced by the decomposing contents of a wine cask, which, being too sweet for immediate use, was allowed to stand unmolested for several years. The door in this case was blocked up and barricaded by the monstrous growth; and when forcible entrance was obtained, the whole cellar was found completely filled; the cask which had caused the vegetable revel, drained of its contents, being triumphantly elevated to the roof, as it were upon the shoulders of the bacchanalian fungi.

Dr. Talbot's Concentrated Medical

is a PREVENTIVE of SICKNESS. The experience that Dr. Talbot has had for the last Twenty-five years convinces him that it is time the public had an article offered that will prevent sickness. The article offered is Dr. Talbot's Medicated Pineapple Cider, designed for all classes, old and young. It is not new to the Doctor, but is entirely new to the public. One quart bottle will last a well person one year. This is rather a new mode of doctoring; nevertheless it will save millions from being sick. Is it not better to pay three dollars a year to keep from being sick, than to pay ten or twenty dollars in doctor's bills, and as much more for the loss of time and the inconvenience of being sick? To prevent sickness, use as follows: Add one teaspoonful of Medicated Pineapple Cider to a tumbler of cold water, and drink the first thing after you rise in the morning, and the same before you retire at night. It will increase the strength and give vigor and action to the system. A celebrated New York merchant, who has made a thorough trial of the Pineapple Cider, assures Dr. Talbot that he gained ten pounds of flesh in one month at the first trial. He continues its use as above directed, and finds it very beneficial; says it has proved an entire preventive to sickness in his case. Also, another well-known gentleman in New York has used the Medicated Cider constantly for ten years, and has not been sick one day during that time.

This wonderful Preparation will increase the strength, give vigor and action to the system, and regulate digestion. When taken internally, for pains of all kinds, Bilious Colic, Diarrhea, Diseases of the Throat, Pains in the Chest, Hoarseness, Coughs, Neuralgia, Rheumatic Pains, Dyspepsia, Acidity of the Stomach, etc., etc., its soothing and quieting effect on the system is most astonishing.

Dr. Wilcox, an eminent physician, employed it with great success in treating Fevers, Dyspepsia, Nervous Affections, Loss of Appetite, Weakness, Palpitation of the Heart, Chronic Diarrhea, Colic Dysentery, and Diseases of the Stomach and Bowels. It is also particularly recommended by physicians to delicate females, and as an excellent remedy for Enfeebled Digestion, Want of Appetite, Scrofula, Nephritic Affections, Rheumatism, etc., etc. It never fails to relieve Nervous Tremor, Wakefulness, Disturbed Sleep, etc. American ladies have used this article with great success to heighten their color and beauty. It imparts cheerfulness to the disposition and brilliancy to the complexion. To travellers especially it is of inestimable value, and should be provided as a medicine for every journey in which the water is likely to vary in quality and tendency. Persons residing in any part of the country may adopt it with the utmost confidence as a timely, efficacious remedy.

THE UNION CARDS

have already revolutionized the card trade, and still the work is only commenced. So great has been the demand for these Cards that the Company has scarcely been able to supply one grade, without attempting the manufacture of other qualities. By the increased facilities which have been added, through great expense, they are now prepared to fill all orders on the day received, and the cordial co-operation of all who love the EAGLE, SHIELD, STARS and FLAG OF THE UNION is respectfully invited.

Of how much more significance are our National Emblems than the homely, meaningless characters used to designate the suits in the old style of cards. Kings, Queens and Jacks are played out! Clubs and Spades no more!!

COLONELS remove Kings; the GODDESS OF LIBERTY scorns Queens; and the MAJOR is high to any Jack in Christendom. In order to secure your interest in the general circulation of the UNION CARDS, the following prices have been established, at which you will be supplied:

ARRANDALE & CO., Manufacturers' Agents,

No. 167 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Announce that all the above list of goods will be sold at Last Sacrifice Prices!

In consequence of the great depression of trade in the manufacturing districts of England, through the war having cut off the supply of cotton, the manufacturers have been compelled to greatly curtail the English market, but from sort of the entire country, and

THEY ARE DETERMINED TO SELL!

Under these circumstances ARRANDALE & CO., sole agents for the principal European manufacturers, have received special advantages, which enable them to offer the following unparalleled inducements:

On receipt of this notice, these articles are first put into envelopes, sealed up and mixed, and when ordered, are sent to applicants without regard to their value, thus giving all a fair chance.

On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you are to have, and then it is at your option to send us One Dollar and get the article named, or exchange it for any article in Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, or any lot of Jewelry on our list of Five Hundred Articles.

Send 25 Cents for Certificate.

In all transactions by mail, we will charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage and doing the business. Only one Certificate will be sent to a single address, unless a stamp for every Certificate desired is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for One Dollar. Twenty will be sent for Five Dollars, and a hundred for $15.

A LIBERAL CASH DISCOUNT will be allowed, in every town and county in the country, and those acting as such will be allowed to sell goods at our Certificate prices for them, provided their remittance amounts to Five Dollars. Circulars, Terms to Agents, Price Lists, etc., sent free to all. Letters in cash or postage Stamps, 167 Broadway, New York.

What the "Press" say of Us.

GREAT GUN ENTERPRISE.—A new opportunity is offered for obtaining watches, chains, diamond rings, silverware, jewelry, musical boxes, etc., at a low rate. Messrs. Arrandale & Co. have an immense stock of articles, ranging in price from 25 cents to $150 each, which they propose to sell at one dollar each. The distribution is very fairly done—you agree to take a dollar article, you send for a certificate, which you get and are not required to pay your dollar unless you are satisfied that you will receive in exchange for it something more than that amount, and may be $50 or $100. As the enterprise is a novel one, it is deserving success.—Boston, New York Daily, Feb. 19, 1863.

Messrs. Arrandale & Co. have been personally known to us, and we believe them to be every way worthy of confidence.—The Scottish American Journal, June 13, 1864.

We have received from the office of Arrandale & Co.'s Agency, a most prepossessing announcing Jewellery, a large assortment of which they offer to Agents, Boys, and others to sell on commission. We also noticed a large quantity of Silver Ware, Watches, Chains, etc. The system of peddling goods appears to be disposed of on a novel principle. Instead of sending out the articles, they are sent to applicants on receipt of a Certificate, stating the value of the article, which the party purchasing can either buy or not, as he pleases. This is a decidedly novel way of disposing of goods, and if the articles are as represented, and the business transacted honorably, we can see no reason why it should not be successful.—The Jewellers' Circular, Philadelphia, Feb. 20, 1863.

We have received from the office of Arrandale & Co.'s Agency, a most prepossessing announcing Jewellery, a large assortment of which they offer to Agents, Boys, and others to sell on commission. Parties desiring to secure the most eligible and profitable employment we have heard of for ladies in many years, should call at the office of Messrs. Arrandale & Co. A lady of our acquaintance has been in their employ for a few days only, during her own pursuit, but she is doing a good turn to close to whom she can recommend the business as being worthy of any company. Gentlemen can also be thus engaged.—New York Weekly Review, Aug. 8, 1863.

In our columns the reader will find an advertisement of Arrandale & Co., who are engaged in selling watches, jewellery and silverware. In payment of this advertisement they receive several columns of the paper gratuitously, and we are warranted in saying that, both in finish and quality, they quite exceeded our expectations. We have called to be sure what they had been represented.—True Democrat (Jacksonville), Aug. 15, 1863.

The British Whig of Kingston, C. W., says, Nov. 26, 1864, one of our lady subscribers became an agent for Arrandale & Co., and by request forwarded some 20 Articles, sent as prizes for her money, to this office for inspection, and without hesitation we can state that each and all of the articles were worth twice the amount of cost to the recipients, and some of them six times.

ARCANA WATCH.

An Elegant Novelty in Watches.

The cases of this watch are an entirely new invention, and consist of six different metals combined, rolled together and planished, producing an exact imitation of 18 karat gold, called Arcana, which will keep for years its color. They are as beautiful and durable as solid gold, and are offered at one-tenth the cost. The case is beautifully designed, with Pencil and Shield for name, with Patent Pendant, and engraved in the same style of the celebrated Gold Hunting Levers, and are really handsomer and stronger, and as near as impossible to gold, as to defy detection. The movements is manufactured by the well-known St. Imier Watch Company of Europe, and are superbly finished, having surveyed pallet, compensation balance, 7 jewels, adjusted to heat, with gold balance, and the improved ruby jewelled setting with fine dial and stem winder, and is warranted a good timekeeper. These watches are of three different sizes, the smallest being for ladies, and are all Hunting Cases. A case of six will be sent by mail or Express for $12, or single watch sent in same manner for $2 50. $3, all really solid Hunting Cases for gents' size and the fine Ladies' size, and $4 for the Large Size. These watches are genuine when they leave the United States.

Knickerbocker

ANTHRACITE COAL COMPANY.

Offices, 415 and 69 Broadway.

CAPITAL STOCK, $600,000.

Shares 60,000 at $10 each.

NO INDIVIDUAL LIABILITY.

Superintendent: M. P. FOWLER, Mahanoy City, Schuylkill County, Pa.

Agent at 415 Broadway: ORLANDO C. CRUGAR.

Agent at 69 Broadway: C. H. RAYMOND.

The following gentlemen are Stockholders, and will act as an Advising Board:

SETH SHEPARD, of Shepard & Co., 23 Broadway, N. Y.
JOHN H. WATSON, 230 Broadway, N. Y.
THE CRUGER SON, of Cruger & Co., 54 Broadway, N. Y.
JOHN FARNELL, of Herring & Co., 251 Broadway, N. Y.
JOHN HERRING, of Herring, Farrar & Sherwood, 8 Murray street, N. Y.
C. BARRINGER SMITH, 262 Broadway, N. Y.
GEORGE PARSONAGE, of Archer & Parsonage, No. 9 Mercer street, N. Y.
J. H. FOLSOM, 69 Broadway, N. Y.

The Colliery owned by the Company is located in the Mahanoy Coal Region, in Mahanoy township, Schuylkill Co., Pa., and upon veins that are a continuation of the celebrated Mammoth Vein of the Lehigh coal basin. It has been in successful operation for the last six months, and has proved to be a valuable property and best description of hard, free burning coal which makes it the most desirable coal for domestic purposes. It is capable of producing and sending to market from 1,000 to 1,500 tons per day, and the facilities which the Company has upon the veins for mining and shipping coal are unsurpassed. More than 1,000,000 tons of coal above water level.

Every Stockholder is entitled to one ton of coal yearly, for each share of stock held by him. Should there be a net dollar coal, then the profit upon the coal to which he is entitled will be paid to him in cash.

Should more than 60,000 tons of coal be mined during any year, the profits derived from its sale will be divided among all shareholders alike, whether they have or have not elected to take coal at cost.

The books for subscription to the capital stock are now open at the offices of the Company, 415 Broadway, corner of Canal street (upstairs), and 69 Broadway (first floor), where specimens of the coal may be seen. Full particulars given on application, either personally or by letter.

Agents and others who have already commenced can send in their orders for coal, which is now ready for delivery.

PROSPECTUS

A NEW FAMILY NEWSPAPER.

Under this title there will be issued from this office a Weekly Family Newspaper, the first number of which will be published on Tuesday, the 16th of May. The CHIMNEY CORNER will have always a continuous tale of unexpected and unrecognizable order. It opens with a story from one of the most popular authors of the day, which deepens in interest with every succeeding chapter, and which is sure to enchain the attention of the reader. Each number will also have a variety of shorter stories from our best American writers, Sketches of Travel and of Society, Anecdotes of Natural History, Biography, Poetry, Agricultural and Horticultural Suggestions and Illustrations, Recipes, Family Medical Prescriptions, Notes and Queries, Parlor Pastimes, Merry Thoughts, Comic Pictures, Portraits and Illustrations, in the best style of American art, of all the departments to which the paper is dedicated.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER starts with a select corps of upwards of two hundred contributors, and has a complete editorial staff of established ability and large experience. It starts assured of success, and of gathering together a circle of readers, will write daily, and to which it will prove an instructor and an entertaining friend and guest.

In addition to these literary attractions THE CHIMNEY CORNER will be the most elaborately illustrated Family Paper ever published, the designs being made expressly for it by the most eminent Artists.

Every number will also contain a most striking and correct portrait, exquisitely engraved, with an original Biography of some eminent person, who may rise by his own exertions to a distinguished position in our Great Republic. This series will be termed

"The Self-Made Men of our Times."

With Nos. 1 and 2 of THE CHIMNEY CORNER will be presented, gratuitously, a magnificent plate, entitled

Grand Reception of the Notabilities of the North at the White House, 1865.

The picture contains nearly 100 portraits of our most celebrated Generals, Statesmen and Civilians, also of many of our most distinguished American ladies. The likenesses are all taken from having been taken from photographs by Brady.

This is the most costly, gift plate ever presented by any publisher in the United States, having been produced at an expense of $10,000.

Every family should possess this truly national picture, and carefully preserve it, as it will treasured in future generations the men who have restored our great national unity. It is especially valuable, as it contains an excellent likeness of our late lamented President, introducing General Grant and his wife to Mrs. Lincoln. This costly plate is the first of a series which it is our intention to present to our regular subscribers.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER will be issued every Tuesday in New York.

It is stereotyped, and back numbers can be had by ordering the same of any News Agent.

Reward for the Assasins and their Accomplices.

THE country has been somewhat startled by a Proclamation from the President, which we publish in another column, offering a reward of $100,000 for the apprehension of Jefferson Davis, "late of Richmond, Virginia," and smaller reward for the arrest of Ex-Secretary of the Interior, Jacob Thompson, Ex-Senator Clay, of Alabama, and some others. It is stated in the Proclamation that there is evidence in the possession of the Government that these persons are not alone malignant traitors (for that is notorious), but subornors to assassination, and were more or less accessories to the plot which resulted in the murder of the late President. It is stated that the plot to assassinate the President was one deeply laid and long cherished, is sufficiently proved in the testimony of all of the criminals already arrested in Washington. That it was concocted in Canada, and was part of the same grand diabolical scheme of which the burning of New York was the last act, no doubt, admits of little doubt. It was not, as we all cheerfully supposed at the first, the act of one or two fools and lunatics, for which no class of men, or any one secret league to his own evil, could justly be held responsible, but a deliberate, concerted murder, known to a large number of persons, approved and known to and approved by the leaders of the rebellion, and by the head of the so-called Confederacy. Two of the miscreants, refugees in Canada, Payne and Booth, had scheduled Consul of the United States in Liverpool, and Mr. George Sanders, late defaulting Navy Agent of New York, one of the plotters with Grand Duke Alexander and Fenian Head Centre, and both Buchanan office-holders and adventurers; these two villains, who it is notorious were concerned in the St. Albans raid, and passed by Jacob Kennedy in his operations near Buffalo and in New York, have had the audacity to come before the public and deny, with circumstantial particulars, that any part of the murder committed by their less cowardly accomplice Booth! However the public may hesitate to believe Davis a consenting or approving party to the raid, it has no doubt that the arch-plotters Thompson, Clay, Sanders and Tucker. There might be some doubts as to Sanders' privacy, were it not for his notorious, lying, boasting, lying character, which renders him an unsafe depositary of secrets, great or small, and a man not likely to be trusted. But we know that he was the active and responsible agent of these very characteristics. When the malignant English scribbler Sala was over here, Sanders accompanied him with the schemes of ruffianism which the rebel refugees in Canada were concocting, and which Sala speaks of as "atrocities that would make the world shudder." Did Sala know of the plot against the life of the President? It would seem so; but his English sympathy with the rebellion was so strong as to make him the willing and guilty depositary of the secret. If not, let him tell us what were the meditated atrocities that were to make the world shudder? And let him tell us at the same time how it was, and under what code of morals he felt himself justified in withholding the word of warning from the intended victims of these atrocities.

It is to be presumed that with evidence of the complicity of the rebel refugees in Canada and Europe before it, requisitions will be made by the Government on the authorities of the countries where they have sought asylum only from the penalties of treason, for their retribution to justice. We know of but one possible act of hostility towards us, of which Canada and Great Britain have not been guilty, which could go to heap up the measure of their hate and animosity, and that would be the harboring and encouraging of the assassins of the American President. We are not prepared to believe that they will be guilty of this last and crowning act of injustice and injury. And yet any who had witnessed as regards the Alabama and the St. Albans' thieves and murderers, what reason have we for believing this infamy impossible?

Yet, we have one reason, and it is precisely this, that the rebellion is dead, and the power of the Union not only vindicated but irresistible. With the capture of a powerful army in Richmond, the case would be different; but with Grant's and Sherman's armies victorious, and still intact, and the navy still on our hands also, we are pecuniarily free for a compliance with international obligations on the part of our neighbors.

The Fall of Richmond in Europe.

NATIONS, equally with individuals, cannot be responsible for the opinions of others; but so far as we are concerned the day is past for us to care much for the criticisms of Europe. We know that as a rule we are cordially hated, by those beneath and over us governing power, by others because of our enterprise in commerce and industry, and by most because we are the exponents, exemplars, and unconquerable supporters of Republican institutions. The experiences of the four long dark years through which we have passed, have shown us that we were not wrong in our belief in the hatred of the Autocratic Russia and Italy, and some of the Scandinavian States have been negatively friendly; that is to say, they have afforded no open hostile action to the Republican, as England, France, Spain and paltry Portugal have done. We have worked out our own salvation with nothing of aid and but little of sympathy from the world, and we do not envy that earth in the fact. We have no obligations to pay off, no alliances, direct or implied, to embarrass us. Entirely independent of any what they may think of us one way or another. Our ire will not be greatly aroused by their misapprehensions and denunciations, nor will our good opinion of ourselves be greatly enhanced by their recommendations. The fact is, as a nation, we have learned precisely what we are, have a thorough conscientious knowledge of our strength and weakness, and read what is said of us outside rather from impulse of curiosity than feelings of real interest. Of this curiosity our readers may possess a sufficient share for this season we rely out a few brief passages from the foreign papers that have reached us by the last mail, merely observing that only the news of the fall of Richmond had reached Europe when they were written.

The London Spectator, which we have before seen our friend, says:

"And now the game is won, and in its first hour of triumph, with the smoke still hovering over the field, and its blast of its dead record, we seek in the nation's joy for signs of the temper in which the conquerors, proclaiming freedom to the slave, accept the conditions given to them by the defeated and unbroken enemies. The enemies are gone, but the nation is still in the hands of a people whose unsubduing feelings is the honest fruit of the love of their institutions. In the hour of triumph to ask pardon for their foes, for the leaders of their foes, for the rebel soldiers, and their comrades for plundering, democracy has given to slavery a lesson in the true conduct of the Master to people after the fall of Richmond."

The Saturday Review, one of our most malignant traducers, reluctantly admits that the "Northern democratic confederacy has "gone up," and is anxious about the "effects of universal emancipation," and how the result will affect the "prospects of cotton cultivation." It has a huge sneer at our personal about what is to be done with the disbanded soldiery, but takes comfort in the reflection that high wages and plenty for all must prevent them from typing their graves on outsiders. Still the prospect is not as clear as it would like:

"The great material strength and the intoxicating military success of the Federals, which seems to weigh its press and by its elections to proclaim all moral responsibility, are not encouraging objects of contemplation. Mr. Seward has characteristically improved the occasion by a circular to the effect that, under existing conditions, his Government will not perpetrate the political absurdity of recognizing Canada. It would, indeed, have been surprising if the occupation of Richmond had not been followed by fresh insults to England."

The London Review "throws up the sponge" for Davis, but with very bad grace:

"We may as well at once make our minds to the speedy restoration of Federal rule over the whole of the former United States. We cease but an opportunity of creating a balance of power on the American continent, we which have gained for England a grateful, stable, and powerful ally in the Southern Confederacy. We might even have done so without any war, because, if we had acted in combination with France when she resented our aggression, the North must have acquiesced in any terms of peace which the western nations had chose to impose. Considerations of humanity and of interest alike forbidden us to intervene. For we might have stayed a cruel conflict, we might have secured, alas for us, the safety of our Canadian possessions, permanently, but we should have put the seal on fratricidal statesmanship. One poor consolation will remain to us. We have saved ourselves from the fate that conquest of the South was framed with danger to this country. And we shall have escaped the duty of American dominion and power, which is that supposing, we, at least, shall be able to offer a refuge to the vanquished. The fall of cities if in one who have long had the will should be found the possession of the power to vanish and leave Augusta."

The London Index owes its one occasion of Richmond its highest kind of flattery and ground for renewed encouragement and hope for the rebels. Of course this was written before the "unconditional surrender of Lee" was squelched by his surrender. We shall look with some curiosity for the next number of the Index. Its says now:

"So far, then, from the occupation of Richmond putting the heart of the southern people ill with regret, some confidence and success attach to the capability of the city as a rallying point for the national cause. Abandoned without the slightest struggle, it has become the object of honor. Jefferson Davis is still the President of the Confederacy, and still the Government holds a loyal country what even an enemy must admit to be vast, at all events when the inclosure of his army must be less difficult than in a beleaguered city, and when he will be able to move more freely in its arcanic and stores. The Confederate armies are at present better equipped than during the first three years of the war, and with the exception of the heavy artillery, which is of little use in the field, are better supplied than the enemy's well provided transcas their chief source of supply.

The Newcastle Chronicle, oblast a provincial newspaper, nevertheless represents the feelings of a large part of the yeomanry of England. It exults in the fall of Richmond, for reasons which it expresses:

"Richmond has fallen! The main army of the slaveholders is flying before the victorious legions of the republic. And with the depression and dismay of rebellion, proclaim and unscrupulous rebels are fugitives. Their day of wild and gloomy triumph is over. Washington, Jefferson and Franklin, and their noble republican, humane, high, and free, if very sincere and intolerant sympathizers with freedom the world over will rejoice. Let us not forget that the first step of the destruction of the Bastille reached the country has been the overthrow of the entire feudal system and of the fall of the slaveholders' capital. The storming of the Bastille French prison marked the first step in the path of the grand struggle for political freedom initiated in France, and the fall of the capital city of the slave monarchy will mark an era in that great social conflict upon which the civilized world is now entered."

Le Temps of Paris, like the Spectator of London, has always been our friend:

"The decisive news from the United States will mark one of the most important dates in the history of the world. It is impossible to exaggerate its importance. It is not only the fall of the capital of the rebellion, but the duration and issuance of which admit immediately, as the result of which, have been so justly felt by Europe; it is not only the happy, abundant and rich soil of the country of slavery; it is the power of indomitable purpose for the liberal interests of the whole people, which, when they were threatened, take up arms, not weakened and diminished, but hampered and strengthened by the sacrifices which they make. It is what they will support loyally, and with a new consciousness of their power and solidity. Let forty expended forces, and even ten wasteful of resources in such a way as history has never seen, they have carried on peaceful works in the midst of a fratricidal war; while the South, which has been so much lauded, and then in the end found so contemptible, has only political liberties, slavery is lost, property is destroyed, the land is ruined, and, after having ruined a free country, has carried with it the ruin of a like liberty, has served only as a sad example of what there is in history and in human misery in the nations which have been subjected to slavery."

The London Herald would like to have the rebels protract hostilities through a guerrilla war:

"If active arms to strike pass on that a regular war is ended, and that guerrilla warfare, an irregular sort of petty system of resistance, that which is stigmatized as a species of warfare, is the last resource of a patriotic people in extremity, and one which has been known in all ages to be the last refuge of such. So long as there was the chance of conquest, evolve order out of chaos, and the reunion of our country, as it had been the Southern populations, if they are determined to be free, they will not submit to be slaves. If they are not possessed in a course which will entail so many sacrifices and so much suffering. We do not quarrel with their right to adopt any method of resistance to which their necessities may point. We applaud their courage and their opposition."

The London Army and Navy Gazette doesn't like the fall of Richmond, but pronounces the "Confederacy" dissolved in thin air:

"These great events have swallowed up or overshadowed the Confederacy. Its existence has become only a name that he wears the more. There is no news of its armies, and no news of its people, but that it progresses. There is news from Alabama that a Federal force has occupied Montgomery, the capital of Augusta, and there is news that Canby and the fleet were one day over Mobile, and that the garrison of Spanish Fort, at Lee's army, and it is justly considered that this defeat of Lee's army, and the fall of Richmond, will be what would be we have never doubted, and our readers know we have never ceased to think from the first, will prove now in the field, and that a weak one, it is impossible that Confederacy can long survive the defeat of Lee, Johnston, Grant and Sherman and Canada on a Thomas and Canby in the West, and the capture of Davis and the slave power has vanished into thin air."

The London News, always our friend, sees in the overthrow hope for mankind:

"The Republic is now brought to a new birth. Hitherto it has been taking with a strong hand cities, fortresses, and armies, and settling the fortunes of this generation, or by their sons, we shall see the Republic, as it was founded by its fathers, those who cherished in mind in those who had not contracted, or who had cast off the habit of thinking for themselves, proceed to choose for and their weakness. Consequently, while the masses of the nation has to reject slavery forever, and secured a new and better adopted the right to it, the nation has the opportunity to found in this generation the true republic it will afford a new and noble spectacle to mankind."

Finally, our ancient enemy, the Times:

"Not a year has elapsed since it was possible for a few governors of peace and compromise to call up and write in favor of them. Now, however, there is no mistake ble cause of doubt or misgiving! Charleston and Richmond are again Federal cities! President Lincoln is lodged in the house of President Davis, and the army of Lee has retired to the interior. The catastrophe seems complete, and in all its accessories calculated to impress the people with a feeling that the work is accomplished, and that the civil war is really at an end!"

THE London Saturday Review closes an article on the United States, written before the fall of Richmond was known, as follows:

"The warlike vigor of democratic institutions has been abundantly illustrated. Experience must show whether the great military power which has been created will be hereafter used for the purposes of aggression. The cheapness of land, and the high rate of wages, will diminish the dangers which are to be apprehended on the disbandment of the contending armies. According to Mr. Disraeli, a territorial democracy is disposed to be peaceable. It is more certain that profitable employment at home disinclines men to enlist in the army."

WE mentioned a week or two since that a vegetable flannel was made in Germany from the pinus silvestris, or Scotch fir. We now learn that there have been since about 1860, two establishments near Breslau, in one of which pine leaves are converted into wool, while in the other, for invalids, the waters used in the manufacture of pine wool are employed as curative agents. The process for converting the pine needles into wool was discovered by Mr. Pannewitz. In the hospitals, penitentiaries and barracks of Vienna and Breslau, blankets made from that material are now exclusively used. One of their chief advantages is that no kind of vermin will lodge in them. The material is also used as stuffing, closely resembles horse hair, and is only one-third its cost. When spun and woven, the thread resembles that of hemp, and is made into jackets, spencers, drawers and stockings, flannel and twill for shirts, coverlets, body and chest warmers and knitting yarn. They keep the body warm without heating, and are very durable. The factories are lighted with gas made from the refuse of the above manufactures.

MR. CHARLES LANMAN writes, that while preparing his "Dictionary of Congress" for publication in 1858, he forwarded to Mr. Lincoln the usual request for a sketch of his life, and received the following reply:

"Born Feb. 12, 1809, in Hardin county, Kentucky.
"Education defective.
"Profession, a lawyer.
"Have been a captain of volunteers in the Black Hawk war.
"Postmaster at a very small office.
"Four times a member of the Illinois Legislature.
"And was a member of the lower house of Congress.
"Yours, etc., A. LINCOLN."

THE grave has closed over the murdered President and his assassin. One rests in honored and sacred ground, within sight of the humble home whence he came to take the helm of state; and the other festers in some obscure ditch, beside the carcase of the last rabid dog that was stoned to death in the byeways. Mankind has anticipated the great verdicts of history. The march of the corpse of Abraham Lincoln from the capitol of the nation to the little cemetery of Oak Hill was a triumph grander than was ever given to soldier or Statesman. As it passed through the great metropolis, heavy with funereal drapery, the marts of traffic were closed, and the pulses of the people were still, in unaffected homage to the dead; and as the train that carried it sped through field and hamlet, the simple ploughboy and country maiden knelt reverently with uncovered heads beside the track, paying thus their simple tribute to the memory of the President, who will share with Washington the title of Great and Good.

The grandeur of the national tribute to the memory of the dead is only paralleled by the magnificent spectacle of the Government passing quietly, unostentatiously, without a shock or jar, through a crisis which, anywhere else in the world, would have carried doubt into finance, commotion into politics, and disorder into the army. In a simple chamber, in an ordinary hotel, the Chief Justice of the nation, the body of the murdered President lying near, presents a well-worn Bible to the man chosen as the Vice-President of the nation; the oath of office is pronounced with no pageantry, no melo-dramatic intonation, no parade of priests, no display of soldiery, no voice of cannon, and the President of the nation walks quietly out from his hostelrie and takes up the mantle of power cast on him without warning and without aspiration, and the nation moves on with its wonted and steady motion. Where on earth have political institutions stood such a test as ours? Where has power passed, in times of turmoil and commotion, with great generals in the field and great admirals on the ocean; when every temptation of ambition might be supposed to be active, and when men might aspire to be Lucifers—when before has power so quietly, and with such simple dignity, passed into its constitutional hands, and absolutely without disturbance in any department of the Government, or in any branch of industry or trade? A slight and momentary vibration in the gold-room, made by foreigners only, was the exception to the general confidence and hope. Now the securities of the nation are absorbed at the rate of seven millions of dollars daily, and the faith of the nation in the strength and wisdom of its Government was never so profound. We have been weighed in the balance, and, thank God for the fact, and for the consciousness of the fact, we have not been found wanting.

TOWN GOSSIP.

The shadows lay along Broadway; 'twas at the twilight-tide, and slowly there a lady fair was walking in her—trowsers. We happened to be passing. She wore—besides the expression of a martyr—the apparel of the Sultan's most venerable and crossest Wife, being a pair of Turkish trowsers, brown, full and flowing. The little boys of New York considered her their choicest benefactor, and trooped in multitudes behind her. Well-dressed gentlemen paused and stared. Ladies widened their lovely eyelids. It was an ovation. The martyr was nettled, and in the haste of the moment a word or two of disgust escaped her. She said, "Oh, my patience." The accusing peri, who flew up to Mahomet's chancery with the expression, grinned as she gave it in; and the recording clerk dropped the veil of the nearest houri upon the words, and they were temporarily forgotten.

Now, why shouldn't a lady dress like the Sultana if she chooses? It is simply a matter of taste. Mrs. Ellen Beard Harman, M.D., finds the weight of publicity, of a sweeping train of little boys, of innovation, and of the trowsers, lighter to her loins than the ordinary duplex-elliptic steel skirt. The policeman who arrested her was a fool. This doctress—whom we should be happy to see if we were not perfectly well—begins as plain Ellen; she continues with a Beard, and she ends with a—man. But all that does not make her trowsers "male attire." The policeman was a dolt, and she says so, so spicily that we cannot help reproducing the most of her capital letter:

"The policeman who arrested me the other day has been reprimanded and discharged by President Acton. 'A man that does not know any better than that,' said he, 'has no business on the police.' 'I had never seen the dress before,' plead Patrick. 'Where have you been? It has been worn these ten years. And every woman wears an overcoat.' 'She had pants on.' 'What if she had? Haven't you got them on, and hasn't she as good a right to wear pants as you have? This is a pretty piece of business to arrest a woman for her dressing! This isn't male attire.' 'A crowd was following her.' 'Why didn't you stop them then, club them if necessary, and take them to the station-house and shut them up, instead of marching her off? She was not doing anything. Go and write your resignation. It will be accepted!' Thus the matter is settled; the rights of dress are maintained; and the New York public, I trust, will act in the spirit of this decision. If one woman may with impunity wear the fashionable burden of dress (and its machinery), at such a cost to herself of health and comfort, and trail it to the inconvenience of others, surely another should be allowed with equal respect and freedom to wear the Reform Dress. There is no principle in this matter, good people. 'A word to the wise,' &c.
ELLEN BEARD HARMAN, M.D."

We have been having a good time with Mr. Charles Kean and Mrs. Charles Kean, late Ellen Tree. The lady is a capital specimen of the lively Englishwoman. Her incurable vivacity is refreshing and instructive. Having some hours since abandoned all pretensions to youthful looks, this estimable lady frisks along the footlights, bearing her avoirdupois nimbly, and determined to show how well she can get along without them. She has a good arm, and we should suppose her to possess great physical strength. She tacks about the stage with the honest directness and angularity of a billiard ball. Her face is of a liberal circumference, and of a character we find it impossible to describe. We only know that when it was weeping we waited yearningly for it to laugh, and when it laughed we longed to fling it an onion and make it weep again. But the soubrette parts she adopts are played with capital intelligence and verve, and she fills the stage (in as many senses as you can possibly imagine), whenever she appears upon it. Middle-age cannot wither her, nor custom stale her infinite variety. We thought her Queen Gertrude the most diverting of her performances.

Charles Kean requires a rather more serious notice. It is impossible to forget his famous father, who tyrannised over the stage 50 years ago with an imperative authority; especially can you not forget the father when the son, in some of his parts, as the Louis XI., represents the historic lineaments of the portraits almost line for line. The restless elder Kean seems to have flung impatiently out of the grave beneath the traps, shouldered away the actor and the modern system of acting, and come to show us how drama should be read and how a passion may be painted without losing dignity.

Mr. Kean's elocution has the repose of almost perfect art. It seems no effort to sharpen the words so well that they cut, even when whispered, into the most distant ears. But the voice that used to roll them is gone; no art can compensate for the loss of a chest-note to inflate the vowels; and no studied mien and expression can make verses perfectly dignified that come out thus:

"To sleep? Perchance to dream. Aye, there's the reb;
For in that sleep of death what dreams may kem—."

His representation of Louis XI., however, deserves all praise. It seemed to us intelligent, keen—(we never pun)—most carefully studied, and powerful. The despicable old tyrant, so false, and therefore so suspicious, so criminal, and therefore so superstitious, was terribly real. We observed modern actors and actresses going to school as it were, to this wonderful personation. And well they might. In respect to the by-play alone there is hardly an artist of the present day who can come near it. The idea always shone in the face before it was spoken, and the fingers often spoke more eloquently than the lips. On Tuesday night Mr. and Mrs. Kean yielded again to Mr. Owens, who had kindly retired for the 11 nights of their engagement.

The National Academy exhibition, with every incentive to a complete success, has dragged a little, and people are beginning to ask if the pictures really do form a competent exposition of American art. There are a number of good landscapes: there are a number of well-executed effigies of the beautiful ladies and intellectual men of whom the republic has such good reason to be proud. The eye that wanders around the delightful galleries reposes first upon a landscape, and then upon a lady; then a landscape and then a gentleman; and then a landscape with a number of gentlemen in the foreground. Who is painting the historical pictures of this nation? The human form seems to be hardly studied at all in this city, except as a model for portraiture, in which sense the photographer serves it with more fidelity than the artist.

In genre or ideal works, few of our artists appear to rise above a single figure, giving the affair more the look of a study than a picture. Among these studies, if we must call them so, we have dwelt with particular interest upon the productions of Mr. Vedder. This youthful poet, abandoning the fantastic conceptions which he has previously exhibited, has in this collection displayed a few sketches and studies from real life, which place him in an advanced rank among the pupils of the beautiful art. His head of the slave Jane Jackson (No. 589). is really excellent, while in his more ambitious works a poetic feeling of a rare and cultivable quality is encouragingly manifest. A sort of classical or ideal grace is thrown about the humblest subject, as "The Girl Feeding Chickens" (No. 76); while in his most ambitious performance, "The Lost Mind" (No. 601), although an artist over our shoulder says that it is statuey, we are sure we detect a very sure feeling for grace and repose. Mr. Vedders appears to be in some danger of being too much impressed by modern French realistic painters; but they can do him no harm if he will observe the direction in which they all point him—to nature.

The best studies from the camp by far are two by Homer. His "Quoit Players" (460), though rough and sketchy, is bursting with life and energy; the man throwing the missile is magnificent, and one or two of the distant figures—the one relieved against a tent for instance—have a felicity of that best sort which seems to be accident, and is in reality a noble art. His group of contrabands basking on the bright side of a tent (190), is as perfect a piece of restrained and delicious comedy as ever was painted; perhaps a group of half-a-dozen negroes was never before assembled in a picture so various in individuality, and perfect in character; it was a good work enough to get up a mass of attitudes, each variously and perfectly expressive of dolce far niente from the slipshod boot to the tip of the hat rim; but the richness of the thing is immeasurably increased by that endlessly long, dreadfully black, and profoundly knowing one who elongates himself through the tent door and reconnoitres the situation; so have we seen in white-hot summer noons, a single hen lift itself in profound silence from among its partners in the dust and cock an inexpressibly knowing eye at earth and heaven.

We have said nothing about the great landscapes which brighten the walls of the Academy. It seems as if they might be allowed to speak for themselves—"saying in odor and color" we don't know what—what does the odor of a fresh varnished canvas express? Some, thing very balsamic and balmy no doubt. There is Bierstadt, with his great "Yo Semite Valley" (436), not half so good as the small study for it previously exhibited; and his "Golden Gate," a tossing chaos of fluid gold; Kensett, always delicate and fresh; the poetic and melancholy McEntee; Gifford, whose brush may be said to dream while it paints; he contributes the "Coming Storm," a very dramatic picture, owned by a great dramatic star; "Hampton Beach;" and a shining and glorious scene among the Shawangunk Mountains (349); they are all beautiful, and they all speak louder of Gifford than they do of nature.

But we never speak about art.

The troupe of careful and conscientious artists belonging to the German Opera deserves every attention and patronage. The singers, if not people of genius, are reliable and accurate. Formes has been acting and singing with glorious spirit and renewing his youth like the eagle. The company attacks the most difficult operas with a pluck that is astonishing. They gave "The Huguenots" very successfully. The truly poetic and inspired "Fidelio" brought out Johannsen in a part worthy of her fine intelligence and genius. It is to be regretted that in the universal depression attendant upon the President's death, this worthy troupe did not receive all the encouragement its members deserved.

Wallack's theatre has had its interior once more illuminated by the countenance of that beautiful and perennial man, Mr. Lester Wallack. He appeared on Tuesday in "The Wonder."

Miss Maggie Mitchell, in her own character of Fanchon, has been delighting the patrons of Niblo's Garden.

The Hippotheatron still revolves. The gigantic attraction to its ring is just now a one-legged male dancer, advertised as the individual man who under the name of Donati or Donato lately amazed the politest circles of Vienna and Paris.

Barnum has found what Solomon sighed for, something new under the sun. Three full-grown and intelligent performers, a horse, a rider and a big snake have first tied themselves up in a great coil, and then had themselves converted into stone, to be purchased, at ever so much the ton, by the President of Showmen. The million of curiosities are as millennial and delightful as ever, and the performances in the Lecture Room fill the benches nightly and morningly with happy crowds.

If your friends insist upon your carte de visite, make them wait until you can go to Clarke's, 643 Broadway. We honestly think him the politest and most obliging artist in the city, and his pictures are all that can be desired for clearness and beauty.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The rebel floating battery which had come down the Roanoke river, N. C., intent on mischief, has been found sunk and abandoned, she having been blown up by a Confederate torpedo.

—— Among the appointments made by Governor Fenton is that of William P. Powell to be notary public. Mr. Powell is a well-educated man, of great respectability, well known to the commercial community as engaged for many years in the business of shipping sailors. He recently took the necessary oath of office at the City Hall. It is the first time a colored man has occupied the position of notary public in this city.

—— The Hon. Charles Sumner has accepted the invitation of the Boston municipal authorities to pronounce an oration on Mr. Lincoln in that city. The services will probably take place in the Music Hall, on Thursday, June 1.

—— Payne, the attempted assassin of the Seward family, has made a full confession of his crime.

—— The Senate of Tennessee has adopted a resolution offering $5,000 reward for the delivery of ex-Governor Isham G. Harris to the civil authorities of that State.

—— Application for National Banks at Richmond, Savannah, Petersburg and Charleston have been made to the Treasury Department.

—— The Government will pay $100,000,000 to discharged soldiers and others during the month of May. 40,000,000 of certificates of indebtedness were redeemed in April.

—— The executive order of January 20, 1865, prohibiting the exportation of hay, is rescinded from and after the 1st day of May, by order of the President.

—— An association has been formed in Washington for the purpose of erecting a suitable monument to the memory of President Lincoln. The following are the officers of the association: Richard Wallach, Mayor of Washington, president; Crosby S. Noyes, secretary; and George W. Riggs, treasurer. It is proposed to raise $100,000 dollars by subscription, to be limited in amount from $1 to $10 per individual contributor.

—— It was only last October that Jeff. Davis, in a speech at Columbia, S. C., vented his imbecile spite against the "Yankees" by saying to his hearers, "Do you not all know that the only way to make spaniels civil is to whip them?" He affected to believe that the Confederacy would be able to plant its banners on the banks of the Ohio, "where," added he, "we may say to the Yankee, 'Be quiet, or we shall teach you another lesson.'" And this poor stuff was uttered at a time when he knew that the fortunes of his bogus concern were utterly desperate.

—— The rebel ram Albemarle, which was sunk at Plymouth, N. C., has been raised, and is now at the Gosport Navy Yard. The cost of raising her was about $20,000. Her machinery was in excellent order, and she sustained but little damage by the explosion of the torpedo. It is intended to put her in seagoing order, and probably she will be sent to New York to be fitted out as a first-class ironclad.

—— It is reported that a torpedo, prepared to represent a lump of coal, was the cause of the explosion of the steamer Sultana, near Memphis, and the loss of about 1,500 lives.

—— It appears that the 40 or 50 negro soldiers enlisted by the rebels under their act of Congress, and who evacuated Richmond with Lee's army, going towards Amelia, dropped off at the rate of about one for every mile travelled, and when the rendezvous was reached the white captain and the colored corporal alone remained.

—— The President has rescinded the Executive order of November 21, 1862, prohibiting the exportation of arms and ammunition from the United States.

—— A mammoth navy gun is just completed at the Fort Pitt Works, Pittsburg. It is named Baelzebub. The bore is 20 inches in diameter; depth of chamber, 14 feet 8 inches; weight, 93,851 lbs.; charge of powder, 125 lbs.; weight of ball 1,080 lbs. The trial was a perfect success.

—— There is not a loyal American who will not cordially agree with the following remarks of the New York Times: "It is now greatly to be regretted that the rebel loan put on the market in England two years ago was not greater in amount. Not more than $15,000,000 of it, we believe, has ever been disposed of, and that is hardly sufficient to make the loss of it as widely and as severely felt as could be desired. It was all taken, and is probably most of it now held by the most unscrupulous, unprincipled, cynical and money-worshipping portion of the English business world; and we need hardly say that it would not only cause deep satisfaction to all good men everywhere to feel that this crew had been heavily mulcted, but would help the cause of morality all over Christendom. There is no way in which they can be so severely punished as through their pockets, and there is no kind of punishment so peculiarly appropriate."

—— The Providence Journal, in a vigorous article on the assassin Booth, closes with this paragraph: "Even at this hour let us not forget that the chief criminals are not Booth and Paine and Harold and Atzerot. Let us keep our eye on those unhung villains who are making their way southward through the Carolinas with the money they have stolen. Jeff Davis and Judah Benjamin and their associates are, it is believed, as guilty as Booth. Their hands are red and dripping with the blood of Abraham Lincoln. Thieves, murderers, tyrants, traitors, let Justice have her perfect work with them, and the whole nation will say, Amen."

—— Edward Ingersoll, of Philadelphia, was mobbed there a few days ago, on his return from New York, where he made a speech, from which this is an extract: "I yield to no man in sympathy for the people of the South, a gallant people, struggling nobly for their liberty against as sordid and vile a tyranny as ever proposed the degradation of our race. Nay, I go further, and with Jefferson, Madison and Livingston, I fully embrace the doctrine of secession as an American doctrine, without the element of which American institutions cannot permanently live."

—— Gen. Halleck, commanding in Richmond, has issued an order that, "No marriage license will be issued until the parties desiring to be married take the oath of allegiance to the United States, and no clergyman, magistrate or other person authorised by State laws to perform the marriage ceremony will officiate in such capacity, until he himself and the parties contracting matrimony have taken the prescribed oath of allegiance."

—— For the first time since the suspension of specie payments, the supply of cents at the Mint in Philadelphia, it is stated exceeds the demand.

—— The discontinuance of the drafting system will relieve from duty a force of persons estimated at 70,000.

—— Gen. Grant's house, which the denizens of the City of Brotherly Love have presented to that officer, has been thoroughly furnished in the best manner and was to have been occupied for the first time by the General's family May 1st.

—— "Extra Billy Smith" (Ex Gov. of Virginia) is now called "Surplus William," as he and the First Auditor of the State endeavored to carry off $100,000 in specie belonging to the Virginia Banks, when Davis fled from Richmond. They proceeded up the canal as far as Buckingham county, scattering the money along the wayside, and placing some of it in the jail in that county, where it has since been found. Gov. Pierpont proposes to offer a reward for "Surplus William."

—— It has always been a rebel boast that our losses in the campaign from the Rapidan to Richmond far exceeded their own; and hence they affected to sneer at the Lieutenant-General as Grant, the butcher. As to the relative losses, let Jackson Hospital speak from its official records for the months of May, June and July, 1864, as to the wounded admitted and the number returned to duty, premising that previous to the 6th of May no wounded appear:

	Admitted.	Returned to Duty.
May	3,917	97
June	2,883	1,370
July	1,849	662
Total	9,649	2,129

These grand totals for three months show this fact at least, that of the severely wounded of the rebel army alone, only one in four were returned to duty within the time covered by the statistics. That the other hospitals would show the same proportion there is no reason to doubt. It has been stated that there are 21 hospitals or more in and around Richmond. Give them in the three months 3,000 each, instead of the 9,649 the official records show Jackson Hospital to have received, and we got a total of wounded brought to Richmond of 63,000. Adding the usual killed in action, and deducting one-fourth as returned to duty, will give a disablement of the rebel army in May, June and July, 1864, of 57,750 men. Of course a portion of these men were in the after months of the year returned to duty, but making all allowance for these, and what becomes of the rebel boast that their losses were slight compared with Grant's?

—— In the last number of the Lutheran and Missionary, we find this beautiful idea: "Our country's faith has learned a new interpretation of her standard. The white typifies the purity of purpose which belongs to her true ruler; the red points to the crimson tide in which life flows forth a willing sacrifice; the blue points her to the home in heaven to which the good are gathered. The stars in her banner tell of light in darkness, and she shall learn to range them in a new and beautiful order, as the Constellation of the Cross."

—— A Springfield (Ill.) dispatch says the general impression seems to be that the extensive grounds known as the Mather property, in the south-eastern part of the city, will be purchased for the last resting-place of the honored remains, though many citizens are desirous that they should repose in the Oak Ridge Cemetery, naturally one of the most beautiful burying grounds in the United States, and just beyond the present city limits.

—— A Mr. Randall, of Providence, R. I., has made a design for a monument to Roger Williams, the founder of the State, and has deposited in one of the Providence institutions for savings $1,000, to remain on interest until the accumulated fund is sufficient to meet the estimated cost of the monument.

—— In San Francisco there is a Chinese doctor named Li-Po-Tai, who makes an income of $20,000 per year.

—— We have now 10 new territories waiting to be made States. They are: Wyoming, Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Nebraska, New Mexico, Utah and Washington.

PERCY; OR, FORTUNE'S FROLICS. By Mrs. Gore. F. A. BRADY, No. 22 Ann street.

This is a story of a young man of genius struggling against disheartening circumstances amid the life of modern London. It contains some pretty strong pictures of literary experience. The type is good, and general style attractive.

REWARD FOR JEFF DAVIS.

A Proclamation.

Whereas, It appears from evidence in the Bureau of Military Justice that the atrocious murder of the late President, Abraham Lincoln, and the attempted assassination of the Hon. W. H. Seward, Secretary of State, were incited, concerted, and procured by and between Jefferson Davis, late of Richmond, Va., and Jacob Thompson, Clement C. Clay, Beverley Tucker, George N. Sanders, W. C. Cleary, and other rebels and traitors against the Government of the United States, harbored in Canada; now, therefore, to the end that justice may be done, I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, do offer and promise for the arrest of said persons, or either of them within the limits of the United States, so that they can be brought to trial, the following rewards: One hundred thousand dollars for the arrest of Jefferson Davis; twenty-five thousand dollars for the arrest of Clement C. Clay; twenty-five thousand dollars for the arrest of Jacob Thompson, late of Mississippi; twenty-five thousand dollars for the arrest of George N. Sanders; twenty-five thousand dollars for the arrest of Beverley Tucker, and ten thousand dollars for the arrest of William C. Cleary, late Clerk of Clement C. Clay.

The Provost-Marshal-General of the United States is directed to cause a description of said persons, with notice of the above rewards, to be published.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, [L. S.] and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the City of Washington, the second day of May, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-five, and of the Independence of the United States of America the eighty-ninth.

THE FUNERAL CEREMONIES AT CHICAGO.

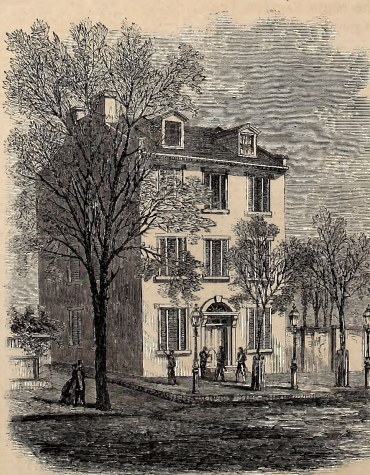
At about noon of the 1st of May, the funeral train containing the honored relics approached the depot, preceded by a pilot engine. The immense crowd, which had been waiting from an early hour, uncovered, and pressed as near as possible around the car which contained the coffin.

The engine was then separated from the train, leaving the funeral car standing in front of the platform. Presently the military guard of honor made their appearance and proceeded to take their appropriate station. Then the committee of one hundred citizens, who received the remains at Michigan City, descended from the cars and formed in order on the platform. Another pause ensued, during which the excitement of the people became more and more intense.

At length the coffin made its appearance, borne on the shoulders of eight sergeants of the guard, who proceeded slowly down the platform towards the funeral arch. The guard of honor from Washington were formed in order around the bier. The Great Western Light Guard band at the same moment played a solemn air with the soldiers carried the coffin up the staging platform erected in front of the arch, beneath which the funeral car was awaiting the remains.

After the coffin was placed upon the dais in the car, and while the solemn strains of the funeral march were pealing in the air, a most beautiful and touching rite was performed. This was the strewing of immortelles and garlands upon the bier, by 32 young ladies of the high school. Before the arrival of the funeral escort this fair company of maidens had been the object of universal admiration and remark. They were placed within the garden in front of one of the residences, where they awaited the coming of the train. Attired in snow white robes, with a simple sash of thin black crape tied with a rosette at the side, bare-headed and with a blue velvet wreath over their brows, in front of which sparkled a single star; some with fair, sunny ringlets hanging loosely around their shoulders; others with their hair arranged in neat plaits at the back—they looked the very emblems of purity.

The courthouse was decorated on the exterior with black and white flags depending from each window. The lower was also draped to the top with mourning. The spacious rotunda, where the remains were to be deposited, was decorated with mourning. Bays of black and white cloth covered all the roof, being gathered into a centre around the chandeliers. The walls were also covered with black and white cloth, and significant inscriptions placed over both entrances, and upon the walls. Over the north door, on the outside, were the words,



The Beauty of Israel is Slain upon thy High Places.

And on the inside, over the same door,

The Altar of Freedom has Borne no Nobler Sacrifice.

Over the south door, on the outside, was the inscription,

Illinois Clasps to her Bosom her Slain, but Glorified Son

HOUSE OF HON. WM. H. SEWARD, WASHINGTON D. C.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, ALBERT BERGHAUS.

And inside, over the same entrance,

He was sustained by our prayers, and returns enshrined by our tears.

In the centre of the rotunda stood the catafalco upon which was to be deposited the remains.

THE COST OF PEACE IN EUROPE.—Those who are alarmed at the expense of carrying on the war against rebellion in this country may find comfort in the following extract from the Paris Siècle. While we are temporarily compelled to expend our money, in order that a permanent and prosperous condition of affairs may be re-established, is mere maintenance of a factitious peace among the jealous nations of Europe causes a constant and measureless outlay. The Siècle says: "In spite of the assurances which are given to us as the maintenance of peace, it is difficult to close one's eyes upon the feelings which animate the Governments one towards another. Distrust is the rule of conduct. Not one of them has confidence in the judgment but all are ill-assured as to defence. This disbelief in that definitive arrangements are such as to obviate movements, and in the excuse which result from these warlike precautions weigh heavily upon the peoples. I would not be surprised to find out that those should desire war through a love for peace. The peace that we enjoy, this armed peace, costing annually four or five thousand millions of francs to Europe, resembles war so much that a good war which would lead to a solid peace, to a disturbed peace, would certainly be preferable. Europe presents the spectacle of a sick man whom physicians would recommend to expect his cure from Chance: 'You are sick, be patient, you suffer, wait' and no other prescriptions. If politicians were to proceed scientifically, the remedy would soon be found. Europe is sick, they would say, and she is sick because her constitution is vitiated by the dirt to which she has been subjected so many years; let us change his diet. But politicians are practical men; they proceed slowly and wisely; they do not want to kill the patient; they much prefer to let him die!"

THE TRAGIC FATE OF A LION TAMER.—A letter from Wurtzburg, Bavaria, in the Petit Journal, gives the following account of a scene said to have taken place in that town on the 25th of January: "A Piedmontese, named Scolagne, a native of Chiuse, has for some time past been exhibiting, with great success, at Wurtzburg, as a lion tamer. On the day above-mentioned, he visited a den containing a lion and lioness, and made them go through various performances. The spectators loudly applauded. Elated by these plaudits, Scolagne determined to do something more extraordinary, and for this purpose he collected in one den a lioness, a lioness, a white bear, two black bears, four hyænas, two wolves and a tiger. He then, armed himself, whip in hand, but the door was hastily closed when the tiger made a spring at the white bear. This was the signal of a terrific struggle among all the beasts, which appeared at once to recover their natural ferocity. Scolagne, hoping to intimidate the animals, fired two shots at the tiger and white bear. This act sealed his fate, for the tiger, hating the bear, sprang on his keeper, threw him down, and began to tear him with his teeth and claws. The other beasts, rendered furious by the smell of blood, all fell on the unhappy man, and in a few minutes he was torn to pieces and almost entirely devoured, in the presence of the horror-struck spectators, who were powerless to render assistance.

FLOATING ON THE LAKE.

BY AMANDA T. JONES.

FLOATING—floating on the lake,
All the merry, merry day;
How the swells arise and break,
Flash and toss their pearly spray!
While I dream—float and dream,
As the billows in my wake
Roll and bubble, glide and gleam,
Creep and vanish in the lake.

Green the shore and fair the lake;
Here the barque and there the glide;
Here the ripple, there the brake;
Here the sun and there the shade,
While I dream—float and dream—
Would my heart might never wake!
Swell and bubble, glide and gleam,
Creep and sparkle, laughing lake!

Sigh and murmur, swelling lake!
I've a lover on the shore;
There he waits my hand to take,
When my wayward mood is o'er.
Still I dream—dost and dream—
Shall I never, never wake?
Creep and darken, glide and gleam,
Sink and swell, O, tossing lake!

Hark! the wind is on the lake;
Shadows drift and veil the skies;
Yonder cloud begins to break;
Forth the baleful lightning flies.
Still I dream—float and dream—
O, my foolish heart awake!
See the billows roll and gleam,
Swell and dash across the lake!

Shoreward flying o'er the lake—
Ah, my friend, too long alone;
Faithful still, though all forsake—
Well my loving shall atone!
While we dream—sweetly dream,
Suns may blaze or storms may break;
Roll and bubble, glide and gleam—
Love is brighter, foaming lake!

The Night-Express Train:

A STORY TOLD BY A RAILROAD MAN.

IN TWO ACCIDENTS.

ACCIDENT THE FIRST.—HE SEES HER THE FIRST TIME.

I TAKE it to b but justice to myself to state here, at the very outset, that what I am about to relate I saw with my own eyes; that I do not ask any one's belief in a statement that has been handed about from mouth to mouth, and which, from its beginning, like ghost-stories, depends for its truth upon the veracity of a third party. I desire, also, that every one should be assured that I was neither mad nor dreaming, conditions in which story-writers often conclude it best to appear to be, knowing well that the majority of people would discredit tales that are really not half so marvellous as mine. And I would appeal to the car-loads of passengers, some of whose names I could name, who witnessed with horror, what even now, when they reflect upon, is not unaccompanied with feelings akin to awe and dread. So certain is it, that at some time where the eye o man fails the hand of God strikes.

I was then, and have been until lately, connected with one of the lines of road that reach from one end of our State to the other. Since the first pick was struck into the ground, preparatory to building the road, which was done by the president of the company, amidst much waving of the Star Spangled, many blasts from brass, and loud cheering from the throats of persons who had invested, now almost forty years ago, I have been connected with the road in one capacity or another, humble, to be sure, but I have always possessed the confidence of the company and superintendent in whatever way I may have been employed. I mention this as an additional reason, to show that myself and my statement are entitled to the confidence of those who may hear or read it. Besides, first, last and always, I like to speak the truth—a liking which has given me the nickname among the boys of "Old Veracity," which I take to be about as much of a compliment as can well be bestowed on a man. I don't believe, now, but what, if taking the hands all along the line of the road, you should ask at random, here and there, amongst them, for Jacob Cockroft, which is my name by rights, and which my father—blessed be his memory!—bore before me, there is one that could point me out to you; but if you should ask for Old Veracity, be sure that a hundred voices could direct you at once to the right spot, so generally have I become known by that name.

THE JILTED LOVER SPURNS THE FALSE ONE'S GIFT

At the time of which I write I was, what you might call, in the prime of life; not that prime by which you would wish to indicate good looks nor sharpness of mind, for I never had either the one or the other, but the prime of my strength, when a hard day's work left no sore remembrancer next morning, when a long breath would swell out my hard chest and make me tingle all over with an excitement almost intoxicating, when my now weak, trembling arms sometimes turn open my shutterwork with the working of the close, compact muscles. I have read somewhere—and I don't do much else now-a-days but read—that a person impresses himself upon the inanimate objects that surround his everyday life; that to look at a manufacturer, or his box of tools, or his desk, will tell one more than merely how he does his work: that you can make shrewd guesses at his character therefrom, at his habits, where he spends his evenings, whether or not he is married, and what his thoughts are mostly about. I think that the materials amidst which we spend the greater part of our time impress themselves on us; that if we dig coal not only our bodies grow dirty, but our minds and souls; if we work with iron, we grow hard, and sinewy, and pitiless even as is it; if we handle the gay fabrics of woman's apparel we grow more gentle, our very hands and bodies are not the only parts of us that grow soft and womanish. While engaged at last, whose hand was almost always on a piece of iron, I grew as hard, and sinewy, and stolid as my engine, when it stood still and appeared to be a horse. It took a more than common occasion to stir up my admiration, pity or anger; but still, like my engine, when the blast was open and the boat bellied up with mirth, I was as entirely different order of being, even as it was, when, with a full load of steam, and with the cylinders, aloft, sharp breathing, it danced through the meadows and green pastures.

I had come on the road, at first, young and gay as the hose of a gang of Irishmen, and when I had seen a few hundred miles of running and reckoning, I had been offered the position of fireman on one of the engines, which I took, and shortly afterwards got over a maidenly shame of my work, was not long before I was running the best engine the company had before the fastest train on the road. There were about the 700 (of the thousand that were numbered on our road), but her general favorite name was Sprightly.

Sprightly was a creature of your common eight-wheeled horses, and that admission, which perhaps I should have given to a wife, was all given to her. She was of my own age, and though she owns another master, the wind, and, like many another fickle mistress, may leave me in the hour of his extremity and need, Sprightly was a prodigious beside them, as beautiful, as prepossessing, more docile and proplicted, and, as I then thought, had no will but mine, no master but me. You should have seen her, with every rib and joint and every plate and bit of brass and steel polished and shining in the sun, like the bright eyes of a beautiful woman, with little flags, fluttering like ribbons from her hair or shoulder, fluttering in the breeze, and her bell-like whistle, with its silver-tipped antlers decorating her front. When she came from her house to be hooked to the train she looked like a sprightly lady, fully dressed, coming out for a stately promenade. She moved with the grace and dignity of a queen, and always acted with the decorum and full of a true loving wife. Inever called upon her for an extra effort but what she responded with more than I asked. We ran from miles to ten and a half minutes at one time, saving the company ten times the cost of a first-class engine, and she never grumbled nor strained, nor grew overheated. It seems that I patted her great black sides, as one would caress a child for a good deed, and was pleasant, even if untruthful, to imagine that she understood and appreciated me.

I had known Sprightly for almost five years over the same track, and we had met with not a single mishap, nor had we been behind time more than ten minutes in any one train during those years. We had become so used to the track, and the curves, and the switches, that if we were running in the darkest night, and with no headlight, she would tell me instantly, by her movements, on what particular square foot of track we were. We were running the fast day express at this time of which I speak. It was called the "lightning train," and it deserved the name, for within the time of light of day, during the long summer days, we could stand upon the shores of the great lakes and by the side of the Atlantic.

About 10 o'clock just before the termini of the road in now a city. It used to be a humble, unpretending little hamlet; but the leading men in its neighborhood had been so generous to the company, that in their turn nearly all of the machine shops, repairing depots, and the principal repairing depots had been stationed there, so that only a few years had sufficed to make it a city of considerable size and much beauty. Our fast running train east reached this place about noon, where it met the train west, and where there were accommodations for a twenty minutes' refreshment to the passengers.

It was a beautiful August Wednesday that Sprightly and I drove into this station from the west, before a magnificent train, and just on the notch of time. I saw that she was provided with a supply of that sustenance which was more necessary for her labor than food and drink is to man, namely, oil in sufficiency, and went to furnish myself with a bite or two and a cup of coffee.

"And thus shall ye eat it, with your loins girded, your shoes on your feet, and your staff in your hand, and ye shall eat it in haste."

That is the manner enjoined to the Jews about Passover time, and it would do right well to paint in large capital letters as a sign over the entrance door of every railway dining-saloon in the land. That is what I mean always thought of whenever I looked at a train of passengers gorging themselves with hot food and burning drinks. The haste and fear of staying too late that is displayed and the rushing noise and clatter of knives, forks and plates is hunger-disciplinary, and gives a well regulated stomach a shiver of horror. And to-day there, with the clash of hammer on hollow wheels, the calling of check numbers, the rumbling of baggage trucks along the platform, and the gush of steam were so ear-piercing that the Wood, the conductor, failed to make me hear, as he stood quite a distance up the platform, and it was only as I sat down to my cates and coffee that he made his way to me, asking pettishly why I did not answer him, and saying that I could not hurry, as the other train was delayed by an accident, and might not be in for some time. The westward-bound train was due at 12 to the road, and this was before telegraph times. The intelligence was not at all agreeable to me, and I laid out the ground plan of a fine dinner, and began deliberately eating very leisurely and very much. Everybody in the saloon was finishing his lunch, and I sat at the end of the long empty table, like a ghost in a banquet-hall deserted.

"I don't know," said Wood, from the frequency of its occurrence, a well-dressed gentleman pass rapidly by the entrance-door several times, scanning the countenances of every one with an eager look, and stepping to look up and down the hall. At length one of the people about the office came to the door to speak to him, and pointing towards me, had said, loud enough for me to hear—

"I don't know, sir; but there sits the engineer."

So that, in all probability he had been looking for the conductor. He came rapidly and directly towards me. His face was deadly pale, and he must have been a pleasing one to look upon. I would think so, for I remember remarking sure in his breast. For it was a very brilliant face, with every large and expressive, the mouth mobile and full, and the nostrils quivering. At the first look one I could plainly see a gleam of dissatisfaction, and the muscles of the other twitched in that manner that denotes a nervous temperament. He threw himself heavily into a chair directly opposite to me, tipped his hat on the back part of his head, and resting his elbow on the table, and his elbow on the table, grasped his head with his hands as if to check its throbbing, and in that manner stared at me for a moment before he said her, which seemed to say, "I believe you are guilty of some hideous thought; come, confess, now."

"You are the engineer?" he suddenly asked. "I am, sir."

"Engineer of this eastward-bound lightning express?" he continued, measuring each word with a look that I could feel on me.

"Just so," I answered; "which I also may consider being an honor."

"Yes, sir, under limited time," he went on, very slowly, "when you leave this station. Sometimes belated trains meet with misfortunes."

I set it down that he was in a state of anxiety respecting some dear friend, whose absence was necessary but deplored, and whose safety was thought to be endangered by delay.

"I am not usually considered to be a reckless individual, sir."

"Oh, no, no," he said, impatiently, "that is not what I intended to intimate. I would that you were," he added, in an undertone. "I think that I have you so well. Do you sell you—"

"Old Veracity," I put in.

"Just so, just so," he said, with an undoubted smile. "I see that I am right. Engineer, I have many times now out of—ten say, putting it arithmetically, do belated trains meet with misfortunes?"

"I don't know," I answered, tartly. "I never have had the greater misfortune at any time than a hot wheel."

"You're a lucky man," he said. "But did you ever have to kill or run over anything that came in the well ever so many times, and when at length it broke it all went to smash?" He brought his hand down before, as if to show that it was to be the dishes clatter and jump, as if he would illustrate his words. "And the dish ran away with the table, and the table ran away with the carpet, dragging he had caused. Then, as if growing very coincidental, he leaned over towards me, laid his hand on my shoulder, and put his face close to my ear. "If this is your time," he whispered, "may it be the same with you, and may you drive there, and back, and all the year 'round safely."

He repeated his expression, shrugging his shoulders, elevating his eyebrows and pointing to the floor with his finger, as if he was trying to understand such language or such actions. Such an occurrence never came within the range of my experience before, and I thought that it must be insane, a drunkard or an idiot that had spoken to me. But his face was as free from all excess and straightened himself. His breath was pure and his eye more than intelligently bright.

"You are sure you are not, Uncle Straightforward," he answered, emphasizing the pronoun as he proceeded. "Not you, but them.

"I am sure that I am not," I said, accordingly. "What do you come to me at host for? People do not, as a general thing, inflict their private ills upon strangers in public places, unless they are fools or something worse. I don't care a rusty filing for you or your wishes!"

"You seem to be moved by them," he said, calmly.

"I am not by them, and don't you think so," I answered, "but that you should tell me. I don't meddle in your affairs, what do you come amongst mine for? Be a sprightly man, and drive your train with speed, caution and safety as the advertisements say, to its destination, notwithstanding your foolishness!"

"You will not," he said, emphatically, "foolishness or not foolishness," and then added in a tone of the politest inquiry, "did it ever happen in the world, that a man's foolishness came after a time to be the world's wisdom? Remember, you will not. There, so much wasted steam is worked off, and I feel better."

He pulled his hat down over his forehead as he said this, and walked away. I muttered some angry exclamation of contempt, though I was just a little ill at ease—not that I feared the man contemplated any mischief to the train, but that I am just superstitious enough to dislike croakers or omens or prophecies.

When I came out upon the platform I very soon discovered what the gentleman wished me to know, that I thought, crack-brained soothsayer. He was leaning very carelessly, with his arms folded, against one of the brick pillars that held up the barrier in the sky, the names of the hotels of the city. He was looking with his great, blue, dissatisfied eyes upon the people who stood in front of the doorway of the ladies' waiting-room. The man's dullness. It was composed of a white-haired old gentleman, two old ladies, a young lady, who was leaning upon the arm of one of the gentlemen, and three or four other young ladies. At almost any other time, accustomed as I was to the sight of young strangers and striking faces, and pleasant groups, I would not have paid the slightest attention to these; but as it was, being so sorely and unaccountably disturbed, not at all in a hurry, and somewhat struck by the marvellous beauty of the young lady, who, as well, attracted the attention of all the passengers, I stopped and stared as earnestly as if I had been looking at Sprightly performing some remarkable feat. I had to think of nothing to speak plainly of but the radiant loveliness of this young creature; but I could not command my memory as she then stood, and I attempt to tell over one by one the outlines of her charms, I get myself bewildered. I remember that she was dressed in a very fascinating, radiant hue, a kind of glitter that attracted, fascinated and magnetized one. I know that she had a profusion of dark, curly hair, rippling back over her forehead, and with large, Jewess-looking, almond-shaped eyes; but whether her attractiveness was owing to a wicked, open beauty, or to a sublime proportion of them all, I cannot say. Old as I was, I felt drawn towards her by an irresistible impulse, and accompanied by many of those pleasant feelings that steal about one's heart and warm it to sympathy and kindness. There was nothing about her like a dread, a fatality, harm to oneself if he ventured within the charmed presence. No idea or remembrance, that, impressed upon my mind, never can be effaced or obliterated, came forcibly into my thoughts while I looked at her. She was a beautiful old Polyglot Bible, that possessed but one merit in my lofty opinion, had a picture of Dalilah, standing, as I thought, with her shears, behind the sandy arrayed, over the object of her treachery lying prone at her feet, and holding the means thereof in her hand. She was a beautiful old Polyglot Bible, and was an East India serpent-charmer drew from a reel.

The memory of these two and the young lady's face will always remain with me now associated together.

She was talking busily, and with much animation, to the gentleman on whose arm she was leaning; but ever and anon she turned her lustrous eyes towards him who had so curiously accosted me in the saloon, and with a look of such affection that came up into them reminded me of a golden goblet filled to overflowing with precious wine.

It needed not a very large stock of penetration to discover that the group was a wedding party. Although I had not the most appropriate guests in such a lovely bride as the young lady was, nor any of the finest appointments for a period of limited womanly display, there was such an air of refinement and gaiety, such a half-way shrinking from the public gaze, such a certain glance of pride from the eyes of the old gentleman towards her who was leaning on his arm, that I was not long in coming to that conclusion; and I was not wrong.

Ike Wood ran up to say that the train was ready, and that all I had to do was to back the engine came up from across the bridge that leads into the town. There was a hustle and stir upon the platform, and the party moved towards the coach that they were to take. I was in no particular hurry, for I was curious. Everything was ready, and all my duties at that end I mounted and spoke to Sprightly.

The gentleman to whom I had left the arm of her attendant, for she disappeared a moment, and then appeared on the edge of the crowd alone, looking towards me, and beckoning me to come. At the time been watching her with his bright, dissatisfied eyes. She went slowly, for both of the gentlemen were detaining from the crowd, and cried out, in surprised tones, "Genie!" She hesitated a moment, then, turning towards them, said, "I will speak to him just once," walking straight up towards the figure leaning against the post. A painful look shot across her face as she saw the change in him—a look that I could have described his pity and forbearance! She could only utter one word, and that seemed to be his name. "Ernest!" she said, in a voice that, by the glance from the blue eyes, that seemed as unfriendly and pitiless as the blue sky of a winter's day, and the sharp, cold, little plowed land, was plained rudely away, and the man swept past her with a sullen dignity. She watched him as he disappeared behind the water tank at the upper end of the platform. She standing motionless and pale, and with her hands clasped before her. Here her lip trembled, and her tiny foot heat restlessly upon the floor! For a scarcely noticeable moment she stood thus, and then, returning to where, to her compassion, and they all entered the coach.

It was high time for me to be gone too, as the western train was thundering up the track and rattling across the last switch. In a moment more sprightly and I were all ready. We were only a little over an hour behind time, but with the fine day and a clear line we could make up every moment. I opened the draft, pulled back the throttle valve, and with a spring we were off.

Just as we entered the deep cut, but a little way from the station, I saw again the mysterious individual, standing like a statue by the side of the track. With his arms folded and his head pulled down over his eyes. I don't know that I experienced any particular mischief from him, though I scanned more closely than usual the track, practicing meanwhile for miles before me. It was all clear, reaching in the sunlight like two slender streams of quicksilver, as seen from a jar in the fire distance. I looked from the window of the engine to the train as the train passed. From one of the windows of the rear coach I saw a small hand put out, and from it there dropped a handkerchief. The lady of the car caught it up, and it flew for a moment, like thistle down in the air, finally settling a few feet from the main. He picked it up quickly, and, as I passed him, and then, taking it in his hands, held it out at arm's length, as if taking its measure. As it passed with a sudden pause, to tore it into bits, cast it on the ground, and stamped it fiercely with his feet. We were leaving him very rapidly, so rapidly that he seemed to be shutting himself up into a statue so closed, and he became a mere speck on the horizon; but so long as I could make out his form I could see him throwing his arms wildly about, and stamping with an unnecessary ferocity upon the ground.

Sprightly did her work like a sentient human being. We glided along with the rapidity and ease of a bird upon the pinion in the air, when we had made the next station that gained more than twenty minutes of our lost time. While the men were piling in the wood, and fixing my fireman, was oiling Sprightly, Ike Wood, accompanied by my beautiful lady (I cannot help calling her so), came along side.

"Ask him," said Ike, smiling and pointing towards me, "ask the healthful lady, with permissive smiles dancing in her eyes and showing under her mouth, exclaimed, in a voice as sweet as her appearance.

"This man is, no doubt, a most excellent conductor, but he is perfectly insensible—a piece of machinery. She laughed a little laugh, and added, "but you are not, will you?"

I never was accosted of being a bashful man, but as she spoke to me the blood all ran to my face, and I felt very, very ill at ease. I looked over me. I managed, however, to look at her with a dogged stare, that concealed admiration and embarrassment, which was probably lost upon her by my knowledge of her situation, and my surmise concerning her and the young man whom she had left behind her. I answered in monosyllables, as if she had spoken in an unknown tongue, until she repeated her question, this time with considerable more emphasis, and I felt her earnestness. "But you won't be; will you?"

"Won't be what?" I said, as kindly and gently as I could, for now I was not afraid to speak to her. She clapped her hands together like a child, and looked up at the old gentleman standing by her side, with a look that I could not suffer appropriate, and, turning again to me, she spoke quickly, at the same time putting her foot on the side of the engine.

"Why, it has always been a desire of mine to ride upon an engine, especially when we are going very rapidly, and I have a friend now on board trying its best to catch up!"

I looked back and particularly will our minds catch hold of the ends of disconnected threads, and tie them together, when we least expect it! I had a most unaccountable appreciation of the young man, that I would not reach my destination in safety, flashed across my mind, and gave me a most unpleasant thrill. These words were the "them" that he had so emphasized. What if, unknowingly, he had prophesied, and she should be left to ride on the engine at the same time! I pointed towards a large printed placard hung behind me: "No one allowed to ride on the engine." I gave a saucy answer to her. The gallop made themselves into a most luxuriant pace.

"You are immovable, too," they said. "But I cannot be moved by you. You know of the laws of the company, don't you, if that is a law of the company?

"If I am ride I am taking, Madam," I answered. "I work on the engine."

"A sophistical engineer," she muttered, as she went back to her place.

If she had remained looking at me half a moment longer, I would have torn down the platform and thrown her in a seat by my side. As it was, it was too late, for the signal had been given, and the train had left the station upon the platform of the coach when we were off.

There was a long stretch of nearly eighty miles before us, with a single curve, and those made shorts, of a steady pull, over the roughest, roughest portion of the road, or perhaps my road, except it was the worst part of the whole line between the various coal fields, before we made another stop. A dreary, hard road, through a country of which, perhaps, the most could be said was picturesque, until the railroad was contemplated, when it suddenly assumed great value in the eyes of its possessors. Sprightly and I were both in our element. The track in the whole distance, but it was all very smooth and kept in perfect condition, and often I have made up an hour's lost time on it almost imperceptibly. I started out with the intention of doing it again, but scarcely had we run half an hour, and Sprightly and I were both glad enough when we got the signal at length from Ike to go on, as all was right.

As we got under weigh, and I felt certain that Sprightly was in good trim for increased exertion, I turned my face around at an exclamation of surprise that burst from Henry, my fireman, and there standing upon the step of the house of the engine, hanging by her delicate hands to the iron railing, with her clothes fluttering and flying in the air, was the beautiful lady! Her lovely face was turned the way we were going, and was lit up with a glorious look. Her attitude and appearance were as if, with outspread wings, she was sailing along in the air by her own exertions. She hardly seemed to be a reality, but only a freak of my imagination; and laborers whom we flew past threw up their hands and cried out in amazement. How she came there I didn't stop to think; but why I too soon knew. I couldn't stop the train to put her back, and she exhibited so much enjoyment that I wouldn't. I carefully lifted her into a seat by my side on the tool-box.

I can neither forgive nor condemn myself for my actions. Though her absence might have averted much that followed, it could not have turned it all aside. Her presence did not attract me from my duty, though it gave me a new sensation in enjoying the exquisite enjoyment she seemed to experience.

The even stride of Sprightly's drivers, along the smooth track, almost like the running of a sleigh, scarcely jarred the lady at all, as she sat very silent and calm just at my elbow, filled with novel sensations. She was looking directly ahead, catching the breeze of the train full in her face, with every little ribbon fluttering out, and a stray curl, here and there, kissing the air.

We were flying along a precipice. Far above us reached the cold, bleak rocks, and birds, gliding about the top of them, seemed mere mites in the air, while away below us, the tumbling river, angrily churned itself into a foam, and seemed to be saying:

"Come down here, oh, come down here, and see how we will chop you into fine bits!"

Through the rocks and in amongst the gullies, it was like playing at hide-and-go-seek with the river. Now almost over it, then darting behind some tall pile of rocks, then hidden by a grove of trees, and then—once more beneath us.

Awaking the echoes with a clatter, we swept through a long cut, for a hundred feet blasted and hewn through rocks laid like masonry. At the further extremity of this cut, a broad, barren and desolate plateau spread out—relieved by only one solitary object—a charred, blackened tree. It stood near the track, tall, gaunt and spectre-like, bending over, as if with its one branch it was preparing to sweep the train over the rocks and down the precipice.

The air of the cut must have been cool and grateful, for as we came out upon the plateau, a deadly, sickening blast of hot air seemed to shoot out at us from the solitary tree, as poisonous as the breath of the vipers. A faintness came over me, and for an instant shut out the light of day, as if by an eclipse. I would have fallen, only I grasped the valve handle with my arm and with a great effort held it firmly. The feeling lasted scarcely during the time of one revolution of Sprightley's driving wheels, but it was terrible. And when the light came back to me again, it was as greatful and novel as if I had been rushed into a new existence.

I looked down towards the lady, and, foolish fellow, remembered my fascinations, the picture of Dalilah and the serpent charmer's music—and dreaded, lest I had been unduly influenced by some power she possessed. Poor lady! far from it. Her face was buried in her hands. Oh! beautiful hands! Her hat had fallen from her head, and the breeze of the train, playing with the ends of her hair, had loosened it, and it had rolled down, down her back, glossy, dark and thick, like water in a heavy mass, tumbling over bleak rocks. Oh! such hair! Glorious crown of beauty! Veil of exquisite delight! She could have buried herself in it, and being a second lady Godiva, could have ridden in her innocence from one end of the land to the other, with no covering but that; and some peeping Tom would not have been able to tell even the color of her skin!

Rich in its wavy folds, like nothing but itself in its magnificent plenty, the rapid motion of the train could only lift a few stray locks here and there, and flutter, like a helpless bird, amongst the rest.

I could not resist the temptation to take a strand of it gently between my fingers. It was like the finest silk, so delicate in its texture; like quicksilver, so soft and yielding to the touch.

She felt me, as I fondled it, as I would have done a specimen of the costliest fabric, shuddered slightly, took away her hands from her face, gazed at me timidly, with just a perceptible blush, for a moment, and then shrank from me, with upraised hands and shrugged shoulders. I was about to say that I begged her pardon for being so familiar, for I am bold to say, that there is no other man on the road who can any quicker tell a real lady than myself, but she seemed to come to her senses, and throwing up her hand and tossing back a lock that had tumbled over upon her forehead, she laughed aloud, and said that she wasn't afraid of such a great, honest-looking, good-natured fellow as I appeared to be.

"I wonder what was the matter with me?" she continued, looking back, as she spoke, with a shudder, "just there by that lone tree. One of the most singular sensations. A withering faintness, as if I was wandering about—a fearfully dark, sultry place, vainly trying to feel my way out."

"Madam!" I cried, in astonishment, for she had most accurately described my own feelings, and back to me came Dalilah and the music of the serpent charmer.

She laughed a shrill, musical laugh.

"You look frightened," she exclaimed. "Have you seen a ghost, or is a lady, with her hat off, and her back hair all down, such a doleful spectacle? Here, here. I'll have a toilet on an engine, going at the rate of sixty miles an hour! Hurrah! That's more than ever Marie Antoinette ever did or could do."

She spoke with great glee, and I obeyed every direction that she gave me, as if the engine had been her dressing room and I her maid-servant.

"Hand me that mirror. So. Hold it for me. What a great bother. So much hair—reach me that comb, will you? see, it has dropped on the floor—what is the good of so much? Puff it, and curl it, and friz it, and braid it, and one must needs make a perpetual barber of herself. It isn't to make little appear much—but a Samsonian exertion to make much seem little. And then to be asked, 'Where did you get it? How much did you pay for it?' Isn't it shameful? I like it in a net best, only Milton says it looks then like the miraculous draught of fishes! Once more, please, that pin there! How smooth this engine rides. I believe that I will always travel on an engine hereafter—you escape all the smoke, and dust, and cinders. Oh! isn't this de-light-ful! There, in that crack, take care, you will lose it, and I will be dis-consolate, the last hair pin."

In she goes, and the great bother is tied up again.

All the while that she had been speaking so rapidly, she had been, as rapidly with well tutored fingers, arranging her hair, and now, that it was at length in order, she put on her hat, folded her shawl about her person, and looked up at me with something such a leer as I have seen canary birds look at the hand that feeds them.

And I looked down at her. Looked! I stared! If a thing of beauty is a joy for ever, what an enviable eternity of bliss was in that face?

At first there was an earnestness and soberness of demeanor between us that was not put on. I saw at length a smile come dancing up into her eyes, and playing about the corners of her mouth. There was a contagion in it, against which I was not proof. Her smiles grew into a laugh, and so did mine. We both gave an audible chuckle, and she put out her hand towards me. I rubbed the palm of my hand upon my sleeve, and took the dainty little object. It was like laying a rose on a shovel! Without the remotest cause for even so much as a smile, both of us fell to laughing in such a vehement, incontrolable manner, that great tears forced themselves from our eyes and rolled down our cheeks! The unusual hysterical exertion for a few moments was so severe that I was weakened by it, and sat down beside her. She, too, could only gasp out, as it were, as she drew her hand from mine.

"Mrs. Gertrude Weyant I am—since this morning only—lately rude, wicked Gertie Cockroft. What is your name?"

"Cockroft! Cockroft!" I said, or rather panted, admiringly. "Why, that's my name too. I am Jacob Cockroft, at your service, mistress," for, with all of our mutual laugh, I could not forget the distance between us, and I arose to my feet to look after Sprightly, who, perhaps because she was a little jealous, had given vent to certain groans and creaks that are not at all pleasant for a machinist to bear.

Mrs. Weyant moved up on the seat nearer to me, and laid her tiny hand softly on my arm. A complete change had almost instantly appeared in her manner. Before she had seemed frivolous, girlish and rude—a hoyden out on a great frolic. A child tired of all its old playthings, enjoying with immense zest the discovery of a new sensation. Now there was a sudden overwhelming eagerness, a wild earnestness about her that I could not understand. And her face—one of those that the sun laughs at when the puzzled artist tries to fix it on the plate and never gets the same one twice—seemed another face entirely.

"Let me look at you," she said eagerly. "Are you really, really a Cockroft?"

I turned my face fully towards her, and said, with what I meant for dignity, and as a rebuke to her for an implied questioning of my truthfulness:

"All along the line of the road I am called 'Old Veracity.' I try to deserve the name, mistress. I never did anything yet to abuse it. What object could I possibly have for doing so now?"

"Don't be angry with me, please," she appealed, plucking at my sleeve. "If you only knew what an intense longing I have always had, a longing that has almost become a mania, to see one of my own old name, you would bear with me. How, for eighteen years now I have lived, the only one of my name that I ever knew, until I thought that I must be branded for some special purpose, that I should be singled out and marked with a name that no one else could hope or would dare to bear. Don't deceive me, please. I never saw another Cockroft until now—if you are really one. For to me there seems a tie between those that bear the same name, that neither interest, affection nor wealth should break. Think, perhaps in your veins and mine runs the same blood!"

The idea made me laugh, inwardly though, for there was too much earnest feeling in her looks and in the tones of her voice, for me to rudely break in with a laugh. What! I so coarse, uncouth, ugly; she so delicate and beautiful. Well, here is the iron. It makes a great coarse, strong anchor, but then out of it, too, one could fashion a lady's toy.

I, too, had lived alone and borne the name of Cockroft—not famously, to be sure, but honestly, if humbly—the only one I ever knew until now, excepting my father, blessed be his memory. And I had felt it neither strange, irksome, nor shameworthy.

And if our names were alike, what could she want with me? Though her misery was most miserable, and her anguish unsupportable, though I might sympathise with, how could I relieve her?

"Don't deceive me!" she said again. "Is your name really Cockroft?"

"Henry!" I cried to my fireman, who was stooping down at some of his labor, and I was a little nettled, "what is my name?"

He laughed, as he raised himself to an erect position, and cried out:

"Old Veracity!"

"Pshaw!" I said, "my real name."

"Jacob Cockroft!" he exclaimed.

I turned to the lady with a rebuking air and said nothing to her, for there were evidences of tears struggling up into her eyes. I could not tell what they betokened, gladness or sorrow.

She took hold of my great hard hand, and held it between hers, and looked wistfully into my face.

"I feel happy for once in my life," she said. "I feel as if I had been wandering, and at length had come home. Oh! this saves me! God is good to us, is he not? When our own motives would lead us into destruction, he stops the way and saves us. Shall I confess to you that I came here to find eternal forgetfulness! But see, I have found a friend—a near relative, perhaps, who will sympathise with me, and be my father."

She looked for a moment over the edge of the window of the engine as she spoke, just down from which yawned a jagged precipice that darted its rough perpendicular way for scores of feet down to the rugged bed of the river.

"Madam," I said, "do you need sympathy?" and it was more an exclamation than a question.

"Sympathy! Where is the creature that does not? Where one that needs it more than I? I am a wretch, a poor miserable creature, without friends, father, mother or relative."

She broke off abruptly, and asked:

"Your name is really Cockroft? Where did you come from? Who was your father? Did you know mine?"

I was not prepared to go into genealogy. It was a portion of my education quite as much neglected as the rest, or as here. And so I told her.

"Don't look at me so coldly," she said, "or my new hopes and happiness will all die out. I beg of you interpose with some excuse to save me from the doom that awaits me."

"What?" I asked.

She pointed back towards the train with a shudder of aversion.

"What can I do?" I asked again.

"Do! You will make me more insane than I am. Call me your sister, your niece, your daughter; tell them that it is an unholy thing to drag one into ties that fill her only with aversion. Tell them that by your right as a near relative, you break the bond with which I am tied. Tell them anything only to save me. Do you know I hate that old man in yonder, with a hate that would sooner direct a knife to his heart, than a kiss—bah!—to his lips?"

She spoke frantically, and her eyes fairly shone.

"And to think of yielding myself up to him!"

She shrugged her shoulders with a horror that made her whole form quiver, and covered her face with her hands, as if to shut herself out from herself. I scarcely knew what to do or say. I could not understand why she came there on the engine with me, or why, being there, because her name by chance was the same as mine, she should make me a receptacle into which her woes could be poured. What were they to me? I know now, that I was as nothing, and that she was simply using me to work herself up for the accomplishment of what she contemplated.

"No relative," she went on after a time, with now and then a sob, and as if she was communing with herself. "No relative, no friend, no mother to avert the blow. Where were they—father and mother? Had they done anything that they should hide themselves away from me, who would sooner have been with them in poverty, or even in crime, than with him with all his money. Who has given me to this wretch? Oh, miserable, miserable Gerty! cruel, cruel fate! Did you see Milton?" she asked suddenly, looking up towards me.

There must have been a decided yes in my countenance, for she went on:

"What is this one to him? Oh, my idol! my darling! Lost, lost, lost! See what Gerty suffers for you—what she will do, now that you are lost!"

I mostly feared hysterics. And it would have been so awkward, and so unexplainable in that place—for she was wringing her hands, and slowly edging herself towards the end of the seat, where one slip would have been immediate destruction. I would endeavor to calm her, I thought, stop the train, and send her back to her husband. With such good intentions, and putting as much of a fatherly tone into my voice as I knew how,

"Mistress," I said, "I think that I understand you, and my sympathies are very, very earnest. But do we not owe it to ourselves to make the best of the lot where God has placed us?"

I must have made a sad mistake in the tone or the sense, for she broke forth worse than before.

"Oh! what have I been saying? What have I been saying? I am so wretched, so utterly wretched!"

Once more I essayed my tongue, and thought to quiet her by humoring her own fancy, but again I fell into an error.

"You will lose everybody's sympathies by such displays, mistress. You are a Cockroft—so am I. Why not show the world that we can bear ills with a brave heart. We will win our own respect."

"This is no ill," she cried out desperately, "no common ill, and I don't want your sympathy. Keep it for some one else that bears our name and deserves it less than I. You talk like a man. What do you know of a woman's feelings. Can you measure diamond dust with a bushel measure? I've had enough of it, and I'll bear it no longer. My heart has been eating itself out, and I'll not have it."

She sprang to her feet as she spoke, and pushed me away from before the engine with so much force that I nearly lost my balance, speaking very rapidly as she tore off her hat and shawl:

"I have been a torment and a stumbling block to myself and all else, since the day I came into the world. It was by a mistake that I came, and a mistake I should be all my life. I see nothing but misery before me, and I have seen enough. God forgive me. Milton lost, it shall be no one!"

She rushed past me towards the engine steps, and unprepared as I was for her desperate action, I was almost too late for her. Oh! the sluggish, snail-like pen, the turgid tongue that takes ten minutes to tell what it took ten seconds to do! And those ten seconds so full of dizzy, unreal reality.

We were thundering along at a terrible rate. I had had no opportunity to check our speed, or even to notice particularly its headlong character. For a moment the beautiful lady hung over the steps, and my own steadiness had nearly deserted me. She struggled in my arms, and tore frantically at my clothes. Her eyes were closed, her lips motionless, and a whiteness as if of death, overspread her whole face. Suddenly, and with a heavy lurch, we turned one of the many curves that twisted about the miles where we were.

It was a high, earthen embankment, and a wide, level space, with the track running straight through the centre spread out before us. Not twenty rods ahead, in murderous ignorance that the belated express was thundering down upon them, stood a long gravel train, waiting its load to be completed.

Oh! the agony of that second! A weight of guilt, of inattention to duty, piled itself upon me, and death seemed to have started up all around me. Behind me coaches crowded with the living rushing on to their destruction unwarned, and myself powerless to avert or to alarm. I lived my life all over the second time. I was a child again, playing about my mother's knee, a boy, a man, and then—so old—so old; but I only remember one sight and two sounds.

The sight was an old man's face, white as the hair that surrounded it, looking with horror at me from the door of the baggage car.

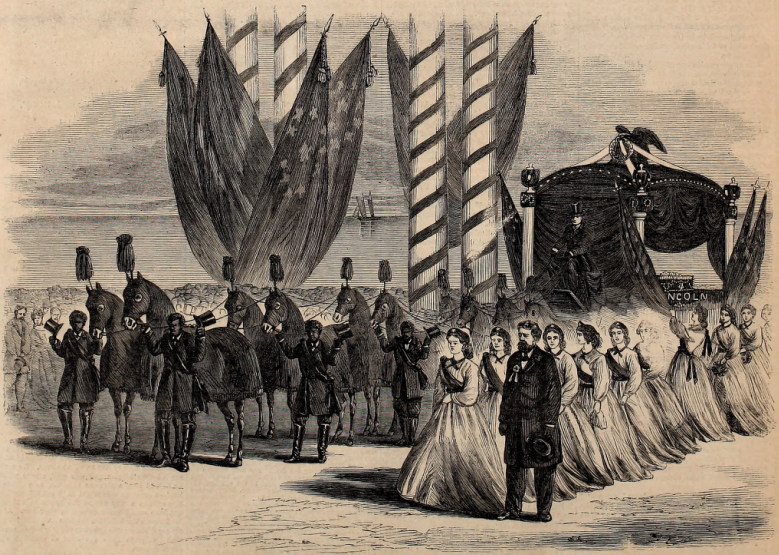
The sounds were the words, "Jump, jump, for the good Christ's sake!" from Henry, as he leaped from the engine, and as I grasped the beautiful lady in my arms, and sprang into the bank, a horrible crash and crunching, and a mingling of shrieks.

A pain shot through my breast and arm, and a darkness more terrible than midnight, shut out, for the time, light and life and sense.

VANCOUVER'S ISLAND.

In May last an expedition was formed to obtain better knowledge of the interior of Vancouver Island, and also with a view to the discovery of agriculture, land and minerals. Mr. Frederick Whymper, who was attached to this expedition, has published a summary of discoveries. The expedition started from Victoria on the 7th of June, and commenced its work at the Great Cowichan Lake, returning from Nanaimo on the 21st of October. They crossed the island in several directions, and made lateral deviations at numerous points, passing altogether over 1340 miles of new country, and exploring, in a tolerably complete manner, the southern half. Of this distance, nearly 600 miles were travelled on foot, more than 700 by canoe, and the remainder by rafts. In the discovery of minerals the expedition met with great success, finding almost immediately valuable veins of copper, apparently inexhaustible in extent; gold was found on all bars of the Cowichan River up to three cents per pan, with indications of richer diggings; and this was followed by the discovery of very rich ironstone in large quantities. In the neighborhood of the Cowichan River they found open tracts of agricultural land, from 300 to 500 acres in extent, ready for the plough; in other districts yet larger spaces; and altogether many thousand acres. Traces of nickel and plumbago were met with; but probably the most valuable of all the discoveries was that of bituminous coal on the coast, close to deep water, and the outcropping of which showed a seam more than a foot in thickness. Many tracts were thinly wooded with scattered maple from twelve to twenty inches in diameter, and others more heavily with forests of the most magnificent spars of Douglas, hemlock and white pine, the latter, from its rarity on the coast, being of great value. Dr. Brown, the leader of the expedition, discovered an entirely new pine; and they brought down to Victoria, for carving purposes, a fine log of arbutus, which in the interior attains to considerable dimensions. To quote the words of Dr. Brown, 'the spars and lumber alone, with their capabilities of being floated to the sea, would prove a certain fortune to any man with capital enough to buy an axe and a grindstone." Many edible wild fruits were found, and a large collection of interesting seeds was made. Of the larger kinds of animals, they saw and shot deer and elk, the latter being in great droves; bears, beavers and wolves were very numerous; martens and raccoons were also plentiful; grouse and wild ducks are described as being found to any extent. The number of lakes in the interior is very considerable; at one place, from Comox at Alberni, a chain of seven reach nearly across the island—the largest of these is twenty-two miles in length. On Barclay Sound two rivers yielded good prospects of gold, paying at the rate of two or three dollars per man per day, and which, if worked by the usual machinery, would yield a much larger extent. The most important of the discoveries, in its immediate effect on the colony, was the finding of gold on the Sooke and Leech rivers. This almost depopulated Victoria for a time, and, within a few weeks of being known these diggings had yielded 40,000 dollars, the Government alone receiving £900 from the sale of licences. The gold from these rivers sold at $20 per ounce. Towards the end the expedition experienced considerable hardships from being imperfectly supplied with provisions, and near Barclay Sound had a narrow escape from coming to grief, owing to the recent chastisements of the Indians in that part by some of our gunboats. They, however, happily escaped all accidents, and arrived in safety at Victoria, having in their discoveries surpassed their expectations.

The Mercantile Library.—The efforts to establish the Mercantile Library on a more enlarged foundation promises to be entirely successful, more than $40,000 having been pledged for that purpose. Fifteen subscriptions amount to $1,000 each. The object of the present movement is to pay off the mortgage upon the building occupied by the library, and to apply the rentals to the purchase of books. By this plan the yearly increase of the number of books in the library—which is now about 6,000 volumes—will doubtless rise to 10,000 or 12,000 volumes. The value of this addition to all classes of the community could scarcely be overestimated.



A curious discovery has recently been made in attempting to repair the basement of Pompey's Pillar. A French engineer, having been appointed by the Viceroy of Egypt to direct the work, caused a few of the loose stones forming the basement to be removed. It was soon found that the pillar rested entirely on a cube of very hard quartzose pudding-stone within the basement. That cube bore an inscription in hieroglyphics, and was, in fact, the capital of a column belonging to one of the temples of Upper Egypt, conveyed hither for the express purpose of serving for the base of the column. M. Mariette has deciphered the inscription, and found the name of Sesostris II., the father of the great Sesostris, mentioned in it; so that Pompey's Pillar, now 1,500 years old, rests on the fragment of a monument erected at least 17 centuries before the Christian era. A new basement has been constructed, with a passage round the stone, so that visitors may inspect the hieroglyphics, and the whole has been railed in to protect the monument from deterioration

DIES IRÆ.

OH! not the man alone, nor yet the chief
He is, whose death hath robed the land in grief;
A myriad murders centre in the deed,
And with one wound a nation's arteries bleed!

The gory stains that streak the dusk of Time
Grow faint and pallid in this noon of crime,
And the Great Record shudders through its leaves
With the vast groan a People's bosom heaves!

From sea to sea an awful murmur flows,
And, as an avalanche, gathers as it goes,
Till, like volcanic thunder to the skies,
From the shaken earth the cries of vengeance rise!

We will have Justice! But we may not bring Him back who was the guardian of our spring,
Who watched and toiled beneath the sombre skies,
Till from the waste he saw new bloom arise.

Patient and pure, one-minded, undismayed;
Of all the wisdom God vouchsafed, he made
A steadfast use, and if his judgment ran
Astray, or halted—he was but a man!

A simple man he was, who felt his way
Bravely through darkness, hoping for the day,
And praying for more light; yet constant still,
To one great purpose with his single will!

God rest him! He hath fallen at his post
As nobly as the noblest in our host
Of martyrs laurel-crowned! And we, bereft,
Look through the gloom, and murmur—"Who is left?"

GUY'S FOLLY;

OR,

The Secret of Thornton Heath.

BY VANE IRETON ST. JOHN.

AUTHOR OF "THE LASS OF RICHMOND HILL," "THE WORLD'S VERDICT," ETC.

CHAPTER VI.—"THERE WAS A FLASH AND A REPORT, AND THE PEN FELL, COVERED WITH BLOOD FROM THE CRUSHED HAND OF THE MISER."

GUY RAYMOND sat in his old-fashioned library in close conversation with his legal adviser.

Mr. Quilpen, the lawyer, was one of those pleasant old gentlemen who joined a perfect knowledge of their business with a large acquaintance with the world and the usages of good society.

A clever attorney and perfect gentleman, he was much sought after by all who knew him.

He was about sixty years of age, of medium height, always wore a white necktie and blue spectacles, his face was red and rosy as an apple, his nose just a tinge redder, and his closely cropped, snow-white hair was brushed off as noble a forehead as you would find in the county.

Guy Raymond looked serious and thoughtful; the subject of their conversation would naturally make him so.

He was performing one of the last solemn duties of mankind—he was making his will.

A large sheet of foolscap on the library table was covered with notes and memoranda, while an old will was in the lawyer's hands, and he was comparing some of its clauses with the alterations and suggestions which were now made by Guy Raymond.

These alterations appeared numerous and important—in fact a complete redistribution of his valuable property.

"With the exception of those little items for servants and so forth, the poor girl is to have everything," said Guy Raymond.

"Everything, sir?" exclaimed Mr. Quilpen, repeating his client's words.

Man of the world as he was, he could not understand why or how it was that a person—a poor girl, not even mentioned in the former will—should now be constituted sole heiress.

"As I say, she is to have everything," repeated the owner of Raymond Park.

"But you forget—surely you forget—your two nephews?"

"I do not forget. They both have forfeited all right to derive benefit from my death."

"Indeed!"

"Yes. One is disobedient—the other is ungrateful."

"But this girl—this Claudia Freshfield—no one knows anything about her. The will will probably be disputed."

"If such a thing should happen, it will be your duty to defend her rights."

The lawyer tapped his gold snuff-box, took a pinch, and offered it to Guy Raymond.

His professional pride was touched, and he resolved to draw out a will which should be beyond dispute.

But at the same time he was determined to make another effort on behalf of the two nephews—Walter Raymond and Ralph St. Clare, who were especial favorites of his—for being constantly in the habit of doing business with the owner of Raymond Park, he had seen much of the two young men, and loved them almost as much as his own sons.

"I wish, sir," he said, laying down his pen—"I wish I could persuade you to forego the resentful feeling you nourish towards those boys, and yield to the dictates of your better nature. Walter Raymond, I know, disobeyed you in his marriage, but I am at a loss to know how Mr. St. Clare has offended you."

"He has robbed me."

"Robbed you! Impossible!"

"Would it were impossible! But my suspicions are too well founded."

"I can scarcely conceive him guilty of such a crime. Depend upon it, Mr. Raymond, that there is some circumstance which, when cleared up, will prove him innocent of the crime of which you accuse him."

"Circumstances point too plainly to him as the thief."

"But pray explain, my dear sir. I am still ignorant of your reasons for suspecting him."

"I will tell you. On the night of the robbery which I told you of, Ralph St. Clare was lingering about in the neighborhood till past eleven. At half-past eleven the robbery was committed, and the thief or thieves escaped safely. The very next day this young man, in whom you seem so much interested, had a large sum of money—gold—in his pockets, and was unable, or unwilling, to give any very satisfactory account for its possession."

"After all, it may not have been your money," said the lawyer, after a pause.

"Where else could he have obtained it but from this house? No, Mr. Quilpen, I feel convinced that he is either the thief or an accomplice."

"But has poor Walter offended so deeply that he cannot be forgiven?"

"He has. By marrying against my expressed wishes he has forfeited his inheritance."

"But ——"

"But, Mr. Quilpen, it is useless pleading for them. My mind is fixed—all my property goes to Claudia Freshfield, who will make better use of it than either of my nephews."

"I am very sorry to hear your final determination," replied the somewhat disappointed lawyer.

For some time nothing more was said on either side.

Scratch, scratch went the pen across the paper, line after line, page after page.

The shades of night began to draw a nun-like veil across the face of the earth, bats began to flap their thin web wings about the old house, the drone of the beetle was heard as it whirled its humming flight round the treetops, and the night wind rustled mournfully among the ivy.

The day had been warm, and the lofty windows of the library of Raymond Park were left open, shaded only by Venetian blinds.

At length the lawyer threw down his pen, the darkness was too much for his eyes.

The master of Raymond Park rang for lights.

While the order was being obeyed, the undaunted lawyer returned once more to the attack on behalf of the nephews.

"There is yet time, Mr. Raymond," he said, "to insert a clause for the benefit of each or either of your nephews."

"Mr. Quilpen, you will oblige me by not mentioning either of their names to me again. Here are candles, so finish the document you are engaged upon. I am resolved that everything shall go to Claudia Freshfield."

The lawyer obeyed in silence, and again the sound of the pen was heard.

Some other sound was heard, too—a sound like a footfall upon the gravelwalk outside the house.

Guy Raymond rose from his seat, and walking to the window, looked out. No one could he see.

At length the lawyer threw down his pen—the document was finished.

"We want witnesses now, Mr. Raymond," he said. "Who shall they be?"

The owner of the house hesitated.

Whom could he trust not to divulge the important secret till after his death?

"If you like, I will send for my clerk; he is a trusty man, and holds his tongue."

"No," said Guy Raymond, "my old servant, John Grover, and yourself, shall be witnesses."

The old man was summoned to the library, and told to pay attention to what Mr. Quilpen would read.

The lawyer blew his nose, and commenced:

"I, Guy Raymond, Esquire, of Raymond Park, in the county of ——shire, do hereby give and bequeath all my estates and property, real and personal, to Claudia, my ward, now in the care of Julia Freshfield——"

"But I thought Mr. Walter and Mr. St. Clare were to have all the money?" exclaimed the old servant, in amazement.

"They have both disobeyed me, Grover, and consequently are disinherited. Proceed with your reading, Mr. Quilpen."

Several little unimportant clauses, bequeathing mourning rings and such trifles to friends, followed.

But the last clause of all was the strangest and strictest.

By it Claudia forfeited all her inheritance, which was to form the foundation of an alms-house, if she ever married Ralph St. Clare.

The lawyer looked inquiringly at Guy Raymond's face as he read it.

There were no signs of relenting there.

"Have you heard all, Grover?" inquired the master.

"Yes sir, but ——"

"No buts; I want you to sign your name as witness."

After this there was a pause.

The lawyer placed the parchment before Guy Raymond, and taking the pen, he prepared to sign the will which was to dispossess his nephews for ever of their property, and establish the poor mad girl as sole heiress of all.

A sudden gust of wind almost extinguished the lamp and fluttered the papers, so that the miser was compelled to lean on them to prevent their flying away.

He took the pen and again began writing.

Hardly had he placed upon the parchment the first letters of his name, when a loud voice at the window startled him.

"An iniquitous will!" it cried—"an iniquitous will, to which no name shall be placed!"

Then there was a flash and a report, and the pen fell, covered with blood, from the crushed hand of the miser.

"Heavens!" cried Mr. Quilpen, "who has done this crime?"

He and the serving-man rushed to the window, but there was no one there.

The miscreant, whoever he was, had fled.

"I see no one," said Mr. Quilpen, as he returned to the table, where Guy had already bound up his bruised hand.

"No matter!" he returned, from between his pale lips—"no matter! Whoever it may be, he has lost time! I will sign the will with my left hand!"

And so with his left hand Guy Raymond signed firmly and legibly; and Mr. Quilpen and John Grover signed their names as witnesses.

The miser dismissed them with a grim smile, and with a look of exultation placed the will in his drawer.

Then, as usual after any event of importance, he left his study through the secret panel, and entered the dazzlingly lighted room which he had visited on quitting Mrs. Freshfield's cottage.

Meanwhile the lawyer and the old servant scoured the grounds.

Their efforts, were, however, in vain; not a sign of the fugitive was to be found either in the grounds or without.

DEVILS ABROAD.

IT seems to be no longer the fashion for devils to distinguish themselves by the cloven foot. Fashions change everywhere, and there is no reason why devils should be behind the rest of the world. The horned and hoofed monster of our infancy has in truth almost become obsolete. In early times the Prince of Darkness was really a gentleman, with whom it was only not quite orthodox to have dealings. He gradually degenerated into the grotesque performer in popular legends. After he had retired into the background of cultivated imaginations, the quaint peculiarities ascribed to him in the fancy of the people still gave him a lease of vitality.

The devil whose nose was pulled by St. Dunstan's tongs, and at whom Luther threw his inkbottle, survived in obscure holes and corners. To the rising generation he is represented in the exclusively comic point of view. His innocuous character is marked by Burns's amiable wishes for his repentance and welfare.

We make, of course, no allusion to theological doctrines; but the devil of poetry and fiction is in danger of utter extinction. In one direction, he has been refined away to a mere empty shell, to a metaphysical abstraction without any concrete attributes; in another, he has been degraded into an old woman's story, which ceases to frighten even grown-up children. It is not, therefore, without a sense of something like satisfaction that we have witnessed some late attempts to galvanize him into temporary vitality. It would be a pity to lose sight of a character who, if not quite virtuous, was certainly amusing in his day.

Mr. Robert Montgomery depicted Satan, as we all know on Lord Macaulay's authority, as an elderly gentleman who had seen better days, and whose worst fault was a tendency to pious twaddle. But since that time he has attempted to come out in his old character. The theory that he raps on tables, and tells a variety of contemptible lies from that degrading position, is indeed little creditable to him. If he had anything to do with tying and untying the Davenport brothers, it was a misplaced effort of ingenuity. It was altogether below the reputation which he had established even as a prompter of the petty malevolence of genuine witchcraft.

Lately, it seems, he has been doing something in his earlier and more malignant style. The people of Morzine, in Savoy, a remote valley to the south of the Lake of Geneva, have for the last eight years been the victims of a series of trials like those which beset the Jansenist convulsionnaires. The first patient was a girl of ten years old, who was being prepared for her first communion, and who exhibited certain symptoms which were immediately attributed to diabolic agency. From her the infection seems to have spread until there were 120 cases of possession in a village of 2,000 inhabitants. The antics performed under this strange influence were alarming to the last degree. The afflicted persons went through extraordinary physical contortions. They turned over and over in one bound. They leapt like a steel spring suddenly released, bending backwards so that head and feet touched the ground together.

A boy of twelve ran up a pine tree eighty feet high. There he bent down the top shoot (so it is said), and stood on it head downwards, singing and gesticulating. Suddenly he came to his senses, and called for help. His elder brother cried out, "Devil, enter again into this child, that he may be able to come down again." The devil obeyed with singular good-nature, and the boy immediately ran down headforemost like a squirrel. The victims seized, who were of all ages and positions, invariably spoke of themselves in the third person and personated evil spirits. The voice of one woman exclaimed, during a religious service by a bishop, "Ah, damned carrion of a bishop, thou makest me depart. How dreadful to have to return to hell.....I must leave this fair body where I was so well off. But when I go, I have five more, and among them an old devil. It is not to-day that they will depart." As a rule, the devils professed to be the spirits of human beings, who were suffering for their sins on earth. The spirit which possessed one woman asserted that it had been damned for eating meat on a Friday. It impelled the woman to go every Friday to the Maire and ask for bacon, which she greedily devoured whilst raw. Every attempt was made to put a stop to the plague. Physicians were sent and could do nothing. Exorcisms were tried, and as might naturally be expected, the excitement only made matters worse. The préfet came and spoke to some of the women. They fell upon him and his gensdarmes. They lifted strong men in their arms and pinned them against the walls. Then, with a sudden bound, they sprang through the window, one after the other, and disappeared. The bishop came and tried the effects of a high mass. It produced a fearful scene of cries, oaths, blasphemies, and fearful convulsions, and the bishop was glad to escape without actual violence against himself. At last a doctor was sent to Morzine with a despotic power, and backed by the important aid of sixty soldiers, a brigade of gensdarmes and a fresh curé. The curé was to preach against the possibility of demoniacal possession, and the gensdarmes and soldiers to put down any overt acts. By dint of exiling all afflicted people to lunatic asylums and hospitals, he seems to have finally succeeded in beating the devil. For four months no new cases have occurred, and it is expected that French bayonets will be more successful in the spiritual encounter than holy water and high masses. Many curious symptoms, such as insensibility to pain, preternatural acuteness of the senses, and a power of predicting the phases of their disease, are mentioned as characterising this display of diabolic energy. One cannot but feel the deepest sympathy for two thousand people shut up in the recesses of an Alpine valley to be tortured by such an appalling complaint. To them it is, of course, witchcraft, and demoniacal power made visible. To be shut up in a madhouse, with a constant prospect of going mad yourself, would be scarcely more horrible. If, however, it were possible to cut oneself off from all feeling for the victims, one would almost regret that the experiment could not be continued.

It would be interesting to discover what are the causes that predispose a person to diabolical possession. The disease is now so rare that we regard its extirpation in this secluded spot with the feelings of a botanist witnessing the destruction of the last specimens of an uncommon plant in some favored habitat. When the devil was acting in all his vigor, no scientific observers traced his mode of action. Now that he has chosen to reappear with something of his old intensity, he is immediately suppressed, as though he were publishing a libel on the French Emperor. Few people, indeed, would wish the freedom of the press to be construed so liberally as to admit even the diabolic side of the question to be avowedly supported. But it would at any rate have the advantage that we should be able to appreciate the diabolic character a little better, and to account for the very singular propensities exhibited. The facts, indeed, of the Morzine demoniacs have not been quite settled. Delusions, and more or less intentional exaggerations, have probably distorted the account. There is a story of a pig refusing to cross a bridge until a priest's stole was laid upon his back, which seems to us suspicious. If he has any regard for his character, the devil should keep out of pigs; the most intelligent pig can scarcely obtain credit for distinguishing priests' stoles.

The strange phenomena which we have noticed have a curious bearing upon another topic. The prevailing scepticism of the period, though it has not affected the people of Morzine, has of course affected their observers. Scientific men have given a variety of names to the demons. They summarily set them down, not as Abaddon, Amaimon, and Lucifer, but as hysteria, epilepsy, mania, and gastric disturbance. These names sound very pretty, but they do not seem to throw much light upon the subject. It is quite clear that it is impossible to classify the causes of the mental disturbance under any of the recognised heads. Thus, to say that it is due to gastric disturbance is to say simply nothing, because, as far as has been observed, the stomachs of the patients were in remarkably good order. It is merely a roundabout way of concealing profound and utter ignorance. Perhaps, until a better theory has been discovered, it would be as well to leave the name of Demons to the occult cause. It does not mean very much, and it serves as well as any other to denote a mysterious agency of which we know nothing at all. Demons are now supposed to do a variety of very small tricks. They make arm-chairs prance, they usurp the place of conjurors, and they are evidently not above contributing to the smallest and most childish kind of amusement. It seems rather hard that when they do so little, and that little is so harmless, their personality should be denied in a way to touch the heart of an old-fashioned theologian. They might be allowed to drag out the small remainder of their days, and to have the credit of such a windfall as that at Morzine. For, after all, if the villagers had been so far enlightened as not to believe in their existence, they would probably have found some other pig upon which to hang the explanation of their strange disease. They did not go mad, because they believed in the devil, but they found the popular conception of the devil a convenient means of accounting for their insane freaks. It is impossible not to observe, in the process by which this was effected, an illustration of some of the legendary miracles of the middle ages.

"THOU HAST PUT ALL THINGS UNDER HIS FEET."

BY WILLIAM C. BRYANT.

O NORTH, with all thy vales of green,
O South, with all thy palms,
From peopled towns, and fields between,
Uplift the voice of psalms;
Raise, ancient East, the anthem high,
And let the youthful West reply.

Lo! in the clouds of heaven appears
God's well-beloved Son;
He brings a train of brighter years—
His kingdom is begun;
He comes a guilty world to bless
With mercy, truth, and righteousness.

O Father, haste the promised hour
When at his feet shall lie
All rule, authority and power
Beneath the ample sky.
When He shall reign from pole to pole,
The Lord of every human soul.

When all shall heed the words He said,
Amid their daily cares,
And by the loving life He led
Shall strive to pattern theirs;
And He who conquered Death shall win
The mighty conquest over Sin.

ONLY A CLOD.

CHAPTER XXI.—CONTINUED.

AND now Francis Tredethlyn appeared to her all at once in a new light. Alas! he was no longer the noble-hearted friend to whom she could appeal for help in the day of trouble. He was no longer the humble adorer, kneeling on the lowest step of the altar, remote and submissive. He was her affianced husband, and he had a right to her society. He had a right to attend her in her walks and rides, to linger near the piano when she sang, to hold perpetual skeins of Berlin wool during those tedious morning visits which he made now and again to the Cedars. All these privileges were his by right; and other people gave place when he approached Miss Hillary, and watched to see her face brighten as he drew near her. It was not that Francis himself was in any way altered. His adoration of his bright divinity was no less humble than of old—even now when he knew that the goddess was to descend from her pedestal and exchange her starry crown for the orange blossoms of an earthly bride. He was in no way changed; the distance between himself and Maude Hillary was as wide as ever. He could see it before him—a palpable gulf, across which he beheld her, a strange creature, in a strange land—a creature who might hold out her hand to him once in a way across the impassable abyss, but who could never draw him near her. Alas for Francis Tredethlyn's loveless betrothal! that dreary distance was growing wider every day now that Iphigenia knew the hour of sacrifice was drawing near.

It had been one thing to think of Mr. Tredethlyn as a friend—a dear and devoted friend, worthy to be regarded with an almost sisterly affection. It was another thing to contemplate him as a future husband. All his ignorance, his homely ways of speaking and thinking, his little awkwardness and stupidities, his vacillating temperament in the matter of spoons and forks at those elaborate Russian dinners—all these things pained Maude Hillary now as cruelly as they had galled Miss Desmond's proud spirit some six months before. And then to the faint shivering pain of disgust was joined all the bitterness of contrast. Never had Harcourt Lowther's image seemed so near to this wayward girl as it seemed now, when she was the promised wife of another man, and tried most honestly to shut the memory of her old lover completely out of her mind. Never had he been so near to her. His graces of manner, his accomplishments, the light touch of his pointed fingers on the piano, the deep organ tone that he alone amongst amateurs could draw out of a flute, the free outlines of his pencil, the transparency of his water-color sketches, the graphic humor of his pen-and-ink caricatures; the airy wit, which never verged upon the borders of vulgarity; the fervid eloquence, which never degenerated into rant; the trenchant satire, which never sank to the vile level of personal spite; she thought of her discarded lover; and all the showy attributes that had won her girlish love arose before her in cruel contrast with the deficiencies of Francis Tredethlyn.

Yet all this time she was very kind to her betrothed husband. It was not in her to be scornfully indifferent to the man whom she regarded as her father's friend and benefactor. She was not a woman to sacrifice herself with an ill grace. The silent warfare went on within her breast. She struggled and suffered, but she had always the same kind, cold smile, the same gentle words for the man whom she had promised to marry.

And in the meantime the hands went steadily round upon all the clock dials, and the inevitable hour drew very near. Busy milliners and dressmakers, bootmakers and outfitters, came backwards and forwards from Wigmore street to the Cedars, and were busy and glad. Mr. Hillary's credit was unlimited, and it was almost as if a princess of the blood royal had been about to marry. Francis Tredethlyn bought the lease of a big, black-looking house in a new neighborhood near Hyde Park; and there were negotiations pending for the purchase of an estate within a few miles of Windsor.

August was melting into September. Already there were bright glimpses of red and yellow here and there among the sombre green of the woodlands. The wedding was to take place very early in October; the guests were bidden, the dresses of the bridesmaids were chosen, and in the still evening Iphigenia walked alone on the terrace. She was very seldom alone at this hour, but tonight her father had taken Francis Tredethlyn to a club dinner, given by a bachelor stockbroker of some eminence in Mr. Hillary's circle. To-night Maude was alone; and leaning upon the broad balustrade, with her elbow resting amongst the thick ivy that crept along the stone, she looked down at the still water—the dark, melancholy water—and thought of her past life.

It seemed so far away from her now, left so entirely behind, all that frivolous past. She seemed to have grown out of herself since the knowledge of her father's troubles had come upon her; and looking backwards she saw a careless and happy creature, who bore no relationship to this thoughtful woman, before whom all the future seemed a blank and dreary country, unillumined by one glimpse of sunshine.

She turned away from the water presently, and walked slowly up and down the long terrace. There seemed to be a melancholy influence in the evening stillness, the dusky shadow lying upon every object, the distant peal of bells floating across the river from some church where the ringers were practising; even the voices of passing boatmen and the low monotonous plash of oars took a pensive tone, in unison with the hour and Maude Hillary's sad, remorseful thoughts.

She was near the end of the terrace, close to that ivy-grown old summerhouse which had sheltered the patched and powdered beauties of King George II.'s Court, when she was startled by the sound of a chain grating against stonework, and rapid steps on the flight of stairs leading from the terrace to the river. The young men who came to the Cedars were very fond of making the journey by water, so there was nothing strange in the sound of a step on the river stair. Maude turned to meet the intruder with a sense of weariness and vexation. He would not be likely to stay long, whoever he was; but the prospect of even ten minutes' idle conventional discourse jarred upon her present frame of mind.

She turned to meet the unwelcome visitor with a languid sigh, and saw a man hurrying towards her in the twilight—a man in whose figure and dress there was a careless grace, an indefinable air of distinction, which, in Maude Hillary's eyes, stamped him as different from all the rest of the world.

He came hurrying towards her. In a moment he was close to her, holding out his arms, eager to take her to his breast. But she recoiled from him, deadly white, and with her hands extended, motioning him back.

"Don't touch me," she cried; "don't come near me. Ah, you don't know—you cannot have had my letter."

"What letter?" cried Mr. Lowther, staring almost fiercely at the shrinking girl. These sort of things so rapidly make themselves understood. Harcourt Lowther saw at once that something was wrong. "What letter?"

"My last; the letter in which I told you that —— Ah, how you will hate and despise me! But if you could know all, Harcourt, as you never can, you might excuse—you might forgive——"

A torrent of sobs broke the sentence.

"Oh, I think I understand," said Harcourt Lowther, very quietly. "You have thrown me over, Miss Hillary."

She held out her clasped hands towards him with an imploring gesture; and then, in broken sentences, in half-finished phrases, that were rendered incoherent by her sobs, she recapitulated something of her letter of explanation. Mr. Lowther's face had blanched before this, and his lower lip quivered now and then with a little spasmodic action, but he listened very quietly to all Maude had to say.

"I ought never to have expected anything else," he answered, when she had finished her piteous attempt to explain and justify her conduct without revealing her father's commercial secrets. "I don't know that I ever did expect anything else," he went on, very deliberately. "What has a penniless younger son to do among the children of Mammon? How can the earthen pot hope to sail down the stream with the big brazen vessels and escape wreck and ruin? Don't let there be any scene between us, Miss Hillary; I hate all domestic tragedy, and I think if my heart were breaking—and men's hearts have been known to break—I could take things quietly. You have grown tired of our long and apparently hopeless engagement, and you have promised to marry somebody else. It is all perfectly natural. May I know the name of my fortunate rival?"

"His name is Tredethlyn—Francis Tredethlyn."

"A Cornishman," added Harcourt Lowther—"a fellow who has lately come into a great fortune?"

"Yes. You know him then?"

"Intimately. I congratulate you on your choice, Miss Hillary. Francis Tredethlyn is a most excellent fellow. I have reason to speak well of him, for he was my servant for a year and a half out yonder in Van Diemen's Land."

"Your servant?"

"Yes. He was really the best of fellows; and in the art of brushing a coat or cleaning a pair of riding-boots positively unrivalled."

CHAPTER XXII.—TAKING IT QUIETLY.

"IF you could know all, Harcourt, as you never can, you might excuse—you might forgive——"

Harcourt Lowther, very quick of apprehension always, especially so where his own interests were concerned, had taken careful note of these broken sentences uttered by Maude Hillary, and, rowing Londonwards in the summer darkness, pondered on them long and deliberately, only arousing himself now and then from his sombre reverie, in order to express his profound contempt for some amateur waterman, who was just saved from a foul by the superior skill of the young officer.

What did it mean? That was the question which Mr. Lowther set himself to answer.

"It means something more than the caprice of a shallow-hearted jilt," he thought, as he rested on his oars and lighted his cigar. "How pale she grew at sight of me! That white, agonized look in her face was real despair. 'If I could know all,' she said. All what? There's a mystery somewhere. Maude Hillary is the last woman in the world to throw over a poor lover for the sake of a rich one. The sentimental girl, who was ready to keep her engagement with me at the sacrifice of her father's fortune, would scarcely marry a clownish rustic for the sake of his thirty thousand a-year. Besides, these heiresses, who have never known what it is to have a wish denied them, are the most romantic creatures in creation, and cherish sublimely absurd ideas upon the sordid dross question. No, I cannot think that Maude would be influenced by any mercenary considerations—and yet how else——"

The villas and villages on the river banks flitted past him like phantom habitations in the dim light. The flat shores of Battersea, the dingy roofs and chimneys of crowded Chelsea and manufacturing Lambeth, the bridges and barges, the low-lying prison, lurking, like some crouching beast, upon the swampy ground, shifted by as the oars dipped in the quiet water, while Harcourt Lowther's light wherry sped homeward with the tide. But all the length of his water journey he could find no satisfactory answer to that question about Maude Hillary; and when he relinquished his boat to its rightful owner at a certain landing-place in Westminster, he was still undecided as to the meaning of those broken phrases which had dropped from the lips of the merchant's daughter in the first moment of surprise and emotion.

"I dare say it is only the old story after all," he thought, as he walked towards the Strand, in the purlieus of which he had taken up his quarters. "Lionel Hillary, being as rich as Crœsus, is determined that no poor man shall profit by his daughter's fortune. Water runs to the river, and Maude's dowry will go to swell that old Cornish miser's savings. It's only my usual luck. I am engaged to a beautiful woman with a hundred thousand or so for a fortune, and I find a victorious rival in the man who cleans my boots."

But Mr. Lowther had not settled the question even yet. Lying awake and feverishly restless in his lodging in Norfolk street, Miss Hillary's pale face was still before him, the sound of her imploring tones was perpetually in his ear.

"'If I knew all, I might forgive—I might excuse!' There must have been some meaning in those words, some secret involved in them. Surely, if her father had forced this marriage upon her, after the manner of some tyrannical old parent in a stage play—surely, if that had been the case, she would have candidly told me the truth—she would have pleaded the best excuse a woman can have. There must be some secret reason for this marriage, and I must be a consummate fool if I fail in getting to the bottom of the mystery."

Mr. Lowther breakfasted early the next morning, and dressed himself with his accustomed neatness before going out. He had no body-servant now whom he could badger and worry when the world went ill with him, or that individual would most assuredly have paid the penalty of Miss Hillary's broken faith. Harcourt Lowther, the younger son, was too poor to keep or pay a valet. He had grown weary of waiting for promotion in the army, as he had sickened of hoping for advancement at the bar, and sold his commission. The world was all before him now, as it had been seven years ago, when he had first looked about him for a profession. The world was all before him, and his one chance of fortune, the possibility of a marriage with Maude Hillary, seemed entirely lost to him. It was scarcely strange if his spirits sank before the dismal blankness of the prospect which he contemplated that morning, as he loitered over his breakfast of London eggs and lodging-house toast and coffee.

He went out a little after twelve o'clock, hailed the first prowling Hansom he encountered in the Strand, and ordered the man to drive to a certain street in the city, sacred to the stockbroking and money-making interests. Here he alighted, dismissed the cab, turned into a narrow court, still more entirely sacred to stockbroking, and entered a little office, where there was a desk, two or three horsehair chairs, a great many bills hanging against the wall, all relating to the stockbroking interests, and a six foot screen of wooden panelling, dividing the small outer office from a larger inner office.

Mr. Lowther walked straight to this screen, and, standing on tiptoe, looked over into the second office.

A gentleman with sandy whiskers, a light overcoat, and a white hat, was standing at a desk, and jotting some pencil memoranda upon the margins of a file of documents, which he was turning over with a certain rapidity and precision of touch peculiar to a man of business.

"Can you spare a quarter of an hour of your valuable time from the calculation of last year's prices for the Fiji Island Grand Junction Stock, in order to devote it to the claims of friendship?" asked Mr. Lowther.

The clerks smiled as they looked up from their desks; and the gentleman in the white hat dropped his pencil and ran to a little wooden door in the partition, over which Harcourt Lowther's hat made itself visible.

"My dear Lowther," he exclaimed, presenting himself in the smaller office, and stretching out both his hands towards the intruder, "this is a surprise; I thought you were at the Antipodes."

"Yes, that's the way of the world," answered Mr. Lowther, rather peevishly; "a man is banished to some outlandish hole at the remotest end of the universe, ergo, he's never to return to the civilised half of the globe."

"But it seems only yesterday when—"

"And that's another cruel thing a man's friends say to him when he does turn up in the civilised hemisphere," interrupted Mr. Lowther. "'It seems only yesterday when you left us;' that is to say, life has been so pleasant and rapid for us, amidst all the gaieties and luxuries and successes of the most wonderful city of the world, that we are utterly unable to believe in the dreary months and years that you've had to drag out, poor devil, in your hole at the other side of the line. That's what a fellow's friends mean when they talk their confounded humbug about its only seeming yesterday."

Harcourt Lowther's city friend was not the most brilliant or original of men when you took him away from the stockbroking interests. He stared blankly during Mr. Lowther's discontented remarks upon the selfishness of mankind.

"Haw! that's good. Meant no offence by allusion to yesterday; only meant that I was jolly glad to see you, you know, and so on. But you see, a fellow turning up in the city when you've been given to understand that he's in Van Diemen's Land is rather a surprise, you know. Can I do anything for you? I'll tell you what, old fellow, I can put you up to a good thing in the Etruscan Loan—panic prices, nine per cent., and certain to turn up trumps in the long run."

Mr. Lowther smiled bitterly.

"Do you suppose I've any money to invest; or that if I had money, I'm the sort of man to sink the glorious principal for the sake of some miserable dribblings in the way of interest? No, my dear Wilderson, you can do me a good turn, but it's quite in another direction. Just step this way."

He had his hand upon the buttonhole of his friend's light overcoat, and led him to the door leading into the court. Here, safely out of the hearing of the clerks at work in the inner office, Mr. Lowther lowered his voice to a confidential tone.

"Wilderson," he said, "I think you know Lionel Hillary, the Australian merchant?"

"Hillary & Co.?" exclaimed Mr. Wilderson—"I should flatter myself I did."

"I want you to tell me all about him—how he stands—how he has stood for some time past; in short, all you know about him."

The stockbroker pulled his hay-colored whiskers thoughtfully, and shook his head.

"These sort of things are rather difficult to know," he said; "but a man may have his thoughts about 'em?"

"And what are your thoughts? Hang it, man, speak out. You talked just now of being ready to serve me. You can serve me in this matter, if you choose."

Mr. Wilderson shrugged his shoulders, and again pulled his whiskers in a reflective mood.

"Dear boy," he said presently, "come out into the court."

Evidently in Mr. Wilderson's mind the court was as some primeval forest, wherein no listener's ear could penetrate.

Out in the court the stockbroker hitched his arm through that of Harcourt Lowther, and began to discourse upon Lionel Hillary, or Hillary & Co., as Mr. Wilderson preferred to designate him. He said a great deal in a low, confidential voice, and Harcourt Lowther's lower jaw fell a little as he listened. One thing was made clear to the ex-officer, and that was, that Lionel Hillary's affairs had been hinted at by the knowing ones as rather shaky; that there had been even whispers of that awful word, "suspension;" but that, somehow or other, Hillary & Co. had contrived to right themselves; and that it was supposed by the aforesaid knowing ones that the Australian merchant had found a wealthy backer.

"There's fresh blood been let into his business, you may rely upon it, dear boy," said Mr. Wilderson. "I know that he was in a Queer Street last Christmas. Bills referred to drawer, and that sort of thing. The bankers were beginning to get shy of his paper. I held a little of it myself, and a deuced deal of trouble I had to plant it."

This and much more to hear did Harcourt Lowther seriously incline. Then he asked Mr. Wilderson to dine with him at a certain noted establishment in the Strand, and left the court, very grave of aspect, and slow of step.

"So my lovely Maude is not a millionaire's daughter after all," he thought. "And my friend Hillary has been dipping his capacious paw into Francis Tredethlyn's purse. I ought to have known that half these reputed rich men are as rotten as a pear. So this is the explanation of my simple Maude's heroics. Poor little girl, she has been the pretty fly with which that accomplished angler, Mr. Hillary, has whipped the stream for his big gudgeon! Any little card I may have arranged to play for myself has been very neatly taken out of my hands; and I find my friend provided with a needy father-in-law and an extravagant wife. However, I daresay there's some small part left for me to play; and perhaps the best thing I can do is to take it quietly.'

Harcourt Lowther's servant!

The man to whom Maude Hillary was now engaged had once been the valet of her discarded lover. This could scarcely be a pleasant thought to any young lady early imbued with all the ordinary prejudices of society. Miss Hillary was not a strong-minded woman; she could not console herself with a neat aphorism from Burns to the effect that "a man's a man for a' that;" and to her Harcourt Lowther's revelation seemed cruelly humiliating. She had heard of young women in her own position marrying grooms, or perhaps even footmen, for love, and she had shuddered at the very idea of their iniquity. But was it not quite as degrading to marry a valet for money as to elope with a groom for love?

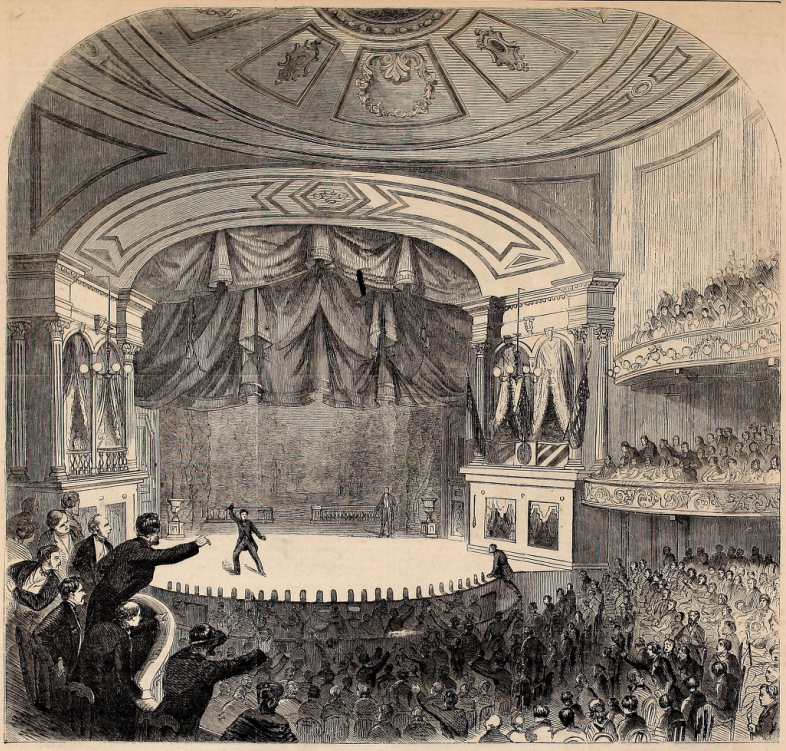
"He blacked Harcourt's boots!" thought poor Maude; and it is impossible to describe the utter despair expressed in that brief sentence. She met her lover with a very pale face the next day, and seating himself in his accustomed place by her embroidery frame, Francis Tredethlyn saw that there was something wrong. Alas! poor Francis, he had already learned to watch every change upon that beautiful face; already, before the marriage vows had been spoken, all the miserable tortures of doubt had begun to prey upon his devoted heart. She had promised to marry him, but she had not promised to love him. He remembered that. She had given herself to him in payment of her father's debt. She had sacrificed herself in accordance with the loyal instincts of her noble nature. Francis, generous and loyal himself, could understand this, much better than it was understood by Lionel Hillary, for whose sake the sacrifice was made.

There were times when the young man reproached himself for his selfishness in accepting the supreme desire of his soul. Ought he not rather to have wrestled with himself and let this bright young creature go. But there were other times when Francis Tredethlyn suffered himself to be beguiled by delicious hopes. Had not true and honest love sometimes triumphed over circumstance? Might not the day come when Maude Hillary would be able to return his affection, to reward his patience?

"I can afford to be so patient," he thought, "for it will be such happiness to be her slave?' To-day, watching her pale face in pensive contemplation, Francis puzzled himself vainly to guess what was amiss with his promised wife. It was not only that she was paler than usual—and the brightness of her color had faded very much of late—but to-day there was a shade of coldness in her manner which was quite new to her affianced husband and which sent a chill to his heart, always ready to sink under some vague apprehension where Maude Hillary was concerned. We hold these supreme joys of life by so slender a thread, that half our delight in them is poisoned by the dread of their possible loss.

"Maude," he said by-and-bye, after a few commonplace phrases, and after he had watched her for some minutes in silence, "I am sure there is something amiss with you to-day. You are ill—you—"

"Oh no, not ill. Only a little worried!"



"Worried—but about what?"

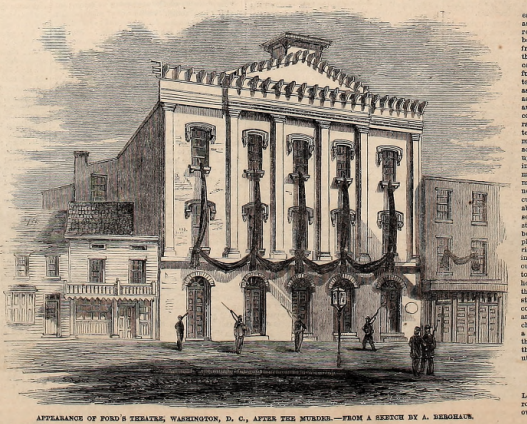
"I heard something about you last night, Mr. Tredethlyn," said Miss Hillary—it was the first time she had called him Mr. Tredethlyn since their engagement—"something which you never told me yourself. Mr. Lowther—a—friend of papa's, who has just come home from Van Diemen's Land, told me—that you had been—"

"His servant! Yes, Maude, it is quite true. I was a soldier, and I was obliged to obey orders. I was ordered to attend upon Ensign Lowther, and I did my best to serve him well. When I enlisted in her Majesty's service I had all sorts of foolish fancies about fighting and glory, but they all dwindled down to the usual routine. No fighting, no glory, no desperate attacks upon Indian fortresses, no scaling walls to plant the British flag upon the enemies' ramparts; but any amount of drill and hard work, and a discontented fine gentleman to wait upon."

A flood of crimson rushed into Maude's face as Francis said this; but the young man's head was drooping over the embroidery frame, and he was trifling mechanically with the loose Berlin wool lying on Miss Hillary's canvas.

"I am afraid you think it a kind of degradation to you, that I should have been a servant, Maude—" he said presently.

MURDER OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN—THE ASSASSIN RETREATING ACROSS THE STAGE AND MR. STEWART CLIMBING UPON IT TO PURSUE HIM.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, A. BERGHAUS.



PEMMICAN.

In the narratives of Henry, Hearne, Carver, Ross and Parry, and in the North and Northwest, we read constantly of Pemmican as the principal article of food. Our readers will not be sorry to learn what this article was:

"Pemmican may be described as animal muscular fibre, either sun or kiln-dried, then ground to a powder and intimately mingled with animal fat. From a consideration of the nature of this material, it will be seen to comprise all the available elements of animal food: nitrogenous material for blood and flesh formation; adipose material for ministering to the respiratory function, and thus liberating animal heat.

"Baron Liebig, too, during the past seven or eight years, has been assiduously turning his profound chemical knowledge to account in a way that can hardly fail to make the South American animal food resources available, to an extent even greater than could be accomplished by any previously known mode of preparation. Some years ago the great German chemist published the fact that the most efficient means of extracting the nutriment from animal flure consisted in treating it with hydrochloric acid, and thus producing an essence.

"His first experiments were suggested through a domestic circumstance—an illness in his own family and the results were found so beneficial, so satisfactory in every way that the essence of meat has now been incorporated amongst the accredited medical agents of the Royal Bavarian pharmacopœia and, we believe, of certain other German pharmacopeias; though this is a point on which we cannot pronounce with certainty.

APPEARANCE OF FORD'S THEATRE, WASHINGTON, D. C., AFTER THE MURDER.—FROM A SKETCH BY A. BERGHAUS.

"The nutritive power of this meat essence, according to French as well as German accounts which have reached us, is extraordinary. It may be that considerations of pleasure from eating would interpose a bar to the general employment of any concentrated meat essence, a teaspoonful of which possesses, according to testimony, as much nutritive virtue as a good beefsteak; but considered as an adjunct to military equipment and hospitals, the virtues of this new concentration are hardly to be overrated. A French military surgeon testifies that a single glassful of a mixture of this essence with wine, administered to a soldier wounded upon the field of battle, exercises an influence which may well be called magical; and when the point is remembered that solid viands could not be swallowed by one thus circumstanced, even were they procurable, the value of Liebig's meat essence may be readily inferred. We stated that the liquid in question has been introduced into the Bavarian pharmacopœia. It is sold in Bavarian apothecaries' shops at the seemingly high rate of two shillings the ounce, having been prepared hitherto in Germany, exclusively from home-bred cattle. Notwithstanding the high price of it, however, Liebig states that the Bavarians have discovered the economy of using it; and that they now constantly purchase it at the apothecaries' without a prescription, thus demonstrating that they obtain it in deference to their own convictions of its intrinsic utility.

THERE are 300,000 houses in London, England, which, if set in a row, would reach across France and over the Pyrenees.

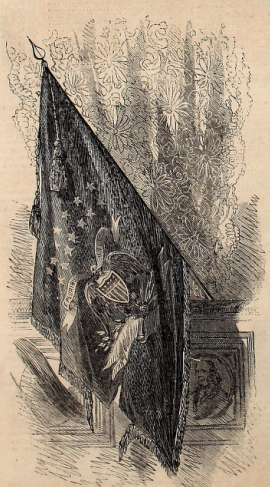
RUINS OF THE SOUTH-SIDE RAILROAD DEPOT, PETERSBURG, VA.



THE depot and other buildings fired by the rebels stood on the right bank of the Appomattox and faced the river. After our forces took possession the gauge of the road was narrowed so as to admit of the passage of our trains from City Point to Burkeville, at which latter point the army were there detained.

FEEDING THE NEEDY POPULACE AT CHARLESTON.

THERE is nothing that will mix a crowd so thoroughly as hunger. In Mr. Crane's Charleston sketch we see the memorable sable pastor and patriarch next to the somewhat seedy Southern belles. The hale "bummer" who has escaped the draft, or who deserting, has stolen to his home, shoulders away the crippled victim of a mad, civil war. The child of slavery puts in a plea by the side of the impoverished aristocrat. And all are equally and freely served by the benevolent power which no sooner

Read! Read!!

The spirit of Nationality which has fired the American heart ever since the rebellion sought the overthrow of our country's prosperity has been productive of many changes—many new inventions.

THE UNION CARDS

have already revolutionized the card trade, and still the work is only commenced. So great has been the demand for these Cards that the Company has scarcely been able to supply one grade, without attempting the manufacture of other qualities. By the increased facilities which have been added, through great expense, they are now prepared to fill all orders on the day received, and the cordial co-operation of all who love the EAGLE, SHIELD, STARS and FLAG OF THE UNION is respectfully invited.

Of how much more significance are our National Emblems than the homely, meaningless characters used to designate the suits in the old style of cards. Kings, Queens and Jacks are played out! Clubs and Spades no more!!

COLONELS remove Kings; the GODDESS OF LIBERTY scorns Queens; and the MAJOR is high to any Jack in Christendom. In order to secure your interest in the general circulation of the UNION CARDS, the following prices have been established, at which you will be supplied:

Dr. Talbot's Concentrated Medical PINEAPPLE CIDER

is a PREVENTIVE of SICKNESS. The experience that Dr. Talbot has had for the last Twenty-five years convinces him that it is time the public had an article offered that will prevent sickness. The article offered is Dr. Talbot's Medicated Pineapple Cider, designed for all classes, old and young. It is not new to the Doctor, but is entirely new to the public. One quart bottle will last a well person one year. This is rather a new mode of doctoring; nevertheless it will save millions from being sick. Is it not better to pay three dollars a year to keep from being sick, than to pay ten or twenty dollars in doctor's bills, and as much more for the loss of time and the inconvenience of being sick? To prevent sickness, use as follows: Add one teaspoonful of Medicated Pineapple Cider to a tumbler of cold water, and drink the first thing after you rise in the morning, and the same before you retire at night. It will increase the strength and give vigor and action to the system. A celebrated New York merchant, who has made a thorough trial of the Pineapple Cider, assures Dr. Talbot that he gained ten pounds of flesh in one month at the first trial. He continues its use as above directed, and finds it very beneficial; says it has proved an entire preventive to sickness in his case. Also, another well-known gentleman in New York has used the Medicated Cider constantly for ten years, and has not been sick one day during that time.

This wonderful Preparation will increase the strength, give vigor and action to the system, and regulate digestion. When taken internally, for pains of all kinds, Bilious Colic, Diarrhea, Diseases of the Throat, Pains in the Chest, Hoarseness, Coughs, Neuralgia, Rheumatic Pains, Dyspepsia, Acidity of the Stomach, etc., etc., its soothing and quieting effect on the system is most astonishing.

Dr. Wilcox, an eminent physician, employed it with great success in treating Fevers, Dyspepsia, Nervous Affections, Loss of Appetite, Weakness, Palpitation of the Heart, Chronic Diarrhea, Colic Dysentery, and Diseases of the Stomach and Bowels. It is also particularly recommended by physicians to delicate females, and as an excellent remedy for Enfeebled Digestion, Want of Appetite, Scrofula, Nephritic Affections, Rheumatism, etc., etc. It never fails to relieve Nervous Tremor, Wakefulness, Disturbed Sleep, etc. American ladies have used this article with great success to heighten their color and beauty. It imparts cheerfulness to the disposition and brilliancy to the complexion. To travellers especially it is of inestimable value, and should be provided as a medicine for every journey in which the water is likely to vary in quality and tendency. Persons residing in any part of the country may adopt it with the utmost confidence as a timely, efficacious remedy.

Messrs. T. & H. GAUGHAN & Co., No. 116 Broadway New York, extensive Manufacturers and Importers of all the leading and most fashionable styles of Watches and Jewellery, desiring to increase their business to an unlimited extent, have resolved upon a great Gift Distribution, subject to the regulations following: Certificates, naming each article and its value, are placed in sealed envelopes and well mixed. One of these envelopes will be sent by mail to any address, on receipts of 25 cents.

All articles sold at $1 each, without regard to value.

On receipt of the certificate you will see what you are going to have, and then it is at your option to send the dollar and take the article or not. Purchasers may thus obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, or any set of Jewellery on our list for $1, and in no case can they get less that $1's worth, as there are no blanks. The price of certificates is as follows: 1 for 25 cents; 5 for $1; 11 for $2; 30 for $5; 65 for $10; 100 for $15. Agents will be allowed 10 cents on every certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to $1. Agents will collect 25 cents for every certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps.

ARRANDALE & CO., Manufacturers' Agents,
No. 167 Broadway, New York.

Announce that all the above list of goods will be sold for One Dollar each.

In consequence of the great stimulation of trade in the manufacturing districts of England, France and Germany, we have purchased, for cash, a large quantity of Valuable Jewellery, of every description, at less than half the usual prices, and will sell it for $1 in this country, and MUST BE SOLD AT ONE DOLLAR EACH.

Under these circumstances, ARRANDALE & CO., acting as agents for the manufacturers, have determined to open a Great Gift Distribution, subject to the following conditions:

CERTIFICATES of the various articles are first printed, and thoroughly mixed and sealed up in envelopes, and are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail to any address on receipt of $1.

On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you are to have, and then if it is not worth more than $3 in the dollar and to the article or not, Purchasers may then choose a GOLD WATCH, Diamond Ring, or any Set of Jewellery on our list for ONE DOLLAR.

Only 25 Cents for Certificates.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificate, to pay postage and cost of the business; from which must be enclosed when the Certificate is returned. Purchasers will be sent to all for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for 10; and a hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—We want agents in every regiment, and in every locality, and will pay a liberal salary, and those parties such will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate sold, provided the Certificate is returned to ascertain if One Dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents by every Certificate sent, and remit $1 certificate to each or postpaid Stamps.

ARRANDALE & CO.,
167 Broadway, New York.

What the "Press" say of Us.

GREAT GIFT DISTRIBUTION.—A rare opportunity is offered for obtaining watches, &c.—ARRANDALE & Co., at No. 167 Broadway, by whom we have received a list. Under Broadway. They have a list which are offered for $1 each. The distribution is very liberal, and parties who agree to take a certificate will receive a certificate, sealed in an envelope, and are forwarded by mail to any address on receipt of $1. Inclosed in the article, which will certainly be worth the money. Parties wishing to try their luck will find excellent means this of investing a dollar.—Sunday Times, New York Saturday Press.

MESSRS. Arrandale & Co. have long been personally known to us, and to many of our friends, as honorable and reliable men in connection.—New York Scottish American Journal, June 11, 1864.

WE have received, at the office of Arrandale & Co.'s Agency for Exposition Manufactured Jewellery, a list of articles which are to be disposed of by the jewellery of the newest patterns we have seen, and the whole of these articles are to be sold for $1 each, that the whole of these newly imported articles are to be disposed of at once, and thereby introduce them to buyers, and thereby avoid the question to be a very respectable and honorable firm, and we can recommend our friends to send our friends to read their advertisement.—New York Daily Times, June 11, 1864.

BY Messrs. Arrandale & Co.'s arrangement, the advertisement is on the plan of the Art Union, and the list is appealing to gain, and nothing comparatively to lose. The articles are to be sold for $1 each, at the present hand, and he need not send it if he is not satisfied.—New York Daily Times, June 11, 1864.

EMPLOYMENT FOR LADIES.—The most eligible and profitable employment for ladies is to act as advertisement of Arrandale & Co.'s Gift Distribution of watches, jewellery, &c. Many ladies in every part of the United States have received several sets of the jewellery advertised, and we are warranted in saying that, both in form and quality, the gifts exceeded our expectations. They turned out to be just what they had been represented.—Irish Democrat (Londonderry), Aug. 31, 1864.

The British Whig of Kingston, C. W., says, Nov. 26, 1864, one of our lady subscribers became an agent for Arrandale & Co., and by request himself issued 20 circulars, sent us prizes for her agency, to the office for inspection, and without hesitation we can state that each and all of the articles were worth treble the amount of cost to the recipients, and some of them ten fold.

How beautiful how charming! to be able to color your own Photographs, without the assistance of a Professional Artist! Why not? Let your fortune be connected with works of your own genius.

Such is the fact. The work is now published, and public approbation gives flattering evidence of its success.

Only think what it is you can buy for $1 that will give you not only an interesting work, but a book which in our country possesses Madame Le Pierre's book and paints by one "perfect treasure."

To be able to color a photograph handsomely is certainly a most accomplishment, and therefore we are confined to a few. The object of Madame Le Pierre's treatise is to place within the power of everybody the means to Color Photographs both pleasing and satisfactory.

Parents, see that your children learn to paint. It is such a charming, healthy, artistic, instructive and refined accomplishment, and the method by which Madame Le Pierre simplifies the art is such that a child can understand it. It teaches how to color portraits, landscapes, flowers, fruits, fowers, etc. School Teachers can make money by acting as agents. Terms liberal to Canvassers and Agents.

Agents wanted everywhere throughout the country. Sample copies sent by mail postpaid. Agents are supplied with handsome sample pictures and cards, free, colored by Madame Le Pierre.

One copy of the Art, handsomely bound in cloth, a full set of Colors, Brushes, original portrait, and a set of brushes will be sent to any address, mailed free, on receipt of $1. Address, FOWLER & WELLS, No. 167 Broadway, New York City.

ARCANA WATCH.

An Elegant Novelty in Watches.

The cases of this watch are an entirely new invention, composed of six different metals combined, rolled together and planished, producing a color resembling 18 carat gold, called Arcana, which will always keep its color. They are made perfectly watertight, and are sold, and are afforded at one-eighth the cost. The case is beautifully designed, with Hand and Hand for music, with Patent Push Pin, and engraved in the exact style of the celebrated Gold Hunting Lever, and are really handsome and desirable, and no exact an imitation of gold, as to defy detection. The movement is manufactured by the well-known St. Imier Watch Company of Europe, and are superbly finished, having compensated jewels, finery carved bridges, adjustive regulator, with gold balance, and the improved ruby jewelled action, with fine dial and skeleton hands, and is warranted a good timekeeper. These watches are of three different sizes, the smallest being for ladies, and are all Hunting Cases. A case of six will be sent by mail or Express for $125. A single one sent in an elegant Morocco Case for $25, will be sent by mail for $30, or C. O. D. We are the sole agents for this watch in the United States, and none are genuine which do not bear our Trade Mark.

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1865, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 504—Vol. XX.] NEW YORK, MAY 27, 1865. [PRICE 10 CENTS. $4 00 YEARLY. 13 WEEKS $1 00.

Failure of the Conspiracy against Republicanism.

THE Spaniards, after an ineffectual struggle of four years, during which they expended many thousands of lives and millions of money, have been compelled to evacuate Santo Domingo. The last of their forces left the island on the 30th of March, a Provisional Republican Government having meantime been organised. So ends the first attempt to reduce the American Republics again under European rule. So end the hopes inspired by the outbreak of our great civil war, which it was supposed and believed would break up the whole Republican System on this continent, and leave all the American States an easy prey to European cupidity and rapacity. There is something like poetical justice in the fact that it was the weakest of all the republics assailed that was first to repel the attack. The Dominican Republic has an area of only about 18,000 square miles, and had a population little, if any, exceeding 150,000 inhabitants, mostly negroes and mulattos. Yet this handful, animated by an unconquerable spirit of independence, have not only been able to resist the whole power of Spain, but to drive Spanish authority from the island, even after it had been fully installed there through the treason of Santana and his accomplices. As observed by a daily contemporary: "For the future of the American continent and its position among the civilized nations of the world, the issue of the Dominican war of independence can have no consequences like those which will follow the restoration of the Union of these States. Still the triumph of the Dominicans will be hailed with cordial sympathy in this country. It is the most mortifying rebuke which has yet been administered to the European schemes of conquest on this continent, and both here and in Europe it will be regarded as foreshadowing the final issue of all similar attempts."

Simultaneously with the news from Santo Domingo, we get advices of the death of the tyrant of Central America, the ignorant and brutal Carrera, of Guatemala, the soul of the reactionary faction of that country, and the instrument relied on by the French to bring Central America within the fanciful Mexican Empire. His death will ensure a speedy revindication of the Liberal party in Central America, which Carrera only kept down through his influence with the ignorant and bigotted Indians, of whom he was a fair type, and with whom no other men ever had or can have equal power. His death will be a mortal blow to the schemes of the France-Austrians in Mexico, and will probably speedily result in the restoration of its really liberal and enlightened Barrios of San Salvador, to the Presidency of that thrifty little State, whence he was driven by the armed interference of Carrera, aided by local traitors and the emissaries of the plot for the Incorporation of Central America with Mexico. A similar reaction will take place in Honduras, which Carrera, through threats of invasion, had obtained in succession, if not real acquiescence to his plans and policy.

Owing to the imbecility of the late Government of Peru, Spain was enabled to retire from her ostentatious attempts on that country, with some show of dignity, instead of being driven out humiliated and disgraced, as she might have been, had that Government reflected the temper and spirit of the people. We say the late Government of Peru, inasmuch as the indignation of the people against the base surrender of their rights and honor by the wretched Perez, President through the death of Gen. San Roman, has led to a revolution so unanimous as to be bloodless. Latest accounts represent Perez and his band of cowards and deserters without any foothold except in Lima, and our next advices will probably be that he has fled aboard some French vessel of war, or his way to the bosom of Napoleon whose declarations he ostentatiously wears, and whose abject tool he has been.

Nothing now remains of the grand scheme devised by the European Powers, under the favorable circumstances afforded by our war, for the subversion of Republicanism and the partition of America, except the sickly offspring of their Unholy Alliance in Mexico. That feeble offshoot of imperialism only requires to be severed left alone by the United States in its national capacity. Maximilian, we know, is recruiting in Belgium and Austria, and has hired a Marshal or two and a number of soldiers in France, to sustain his usurpations. The legitimists Government of the country, it is said, proposes to do something of the sort elsewhere, if anything has an equal right to do. We will not have to wait long for the result.

PROSPECTUS

A NEW FAMILY NEWSPAPER.

Under this title there will be issued from this office a Weekly Family Newspaper, the first number of which will be published on Tuesday, the 23rd of May. The CHIMNEY CORNER will have always a continuous tale of a superior and unexceptionable order. It opens with a story from one of the most popular authors of the day, which deepens in interest with every succeeding chapter, and which is sure to enchain the attention of the reader. Each number will also have a variety of short stories from our best American writers, Sketches of Travel and of Society, Anecdotes of Natural History, Biography, Poetry, Agricultural and Horticultural Suggestions and Illustrations, Recipes, Family Medical Prescriptions, Notes and Queries, Parlor Pastimes, Merry Pictures, Comic Pictures, Portraits and Illustrations, in the best style of American art, of all the departments to which the paper is dedicated.

The CHIMNEY CORNER starts with a select corps of upwards of two hundred contributors, and has a complete editorial staff of established ability and experience. All its elements augur of success, and of gathering together a circle of readers which will widen daily, and to which it will prove an instructor and an entertaining friend and guide.

In addition to these literary attractions THE CHIMNEY CORNER will be the most elaborately illustrated Family Paper ever published, the designs being made expressly for it by the most eminent Artists.

Every number will also contain a most striking and correct portrait, exquisitely engraved, with an original biography of some noted person, who has risen by his own exertions to a distinguished position in our Great Republic. This series will be continued

"The Self-Made Men of our Times."

With Nos. 1 and 2 of THE CHIMNEY CORNER will be presented, gratuitously, a magnificent plate, entitled

Grand Reception of the Notabilities of the Nation at the White House, 1865.

The picture contains nearly 100 portraits of our most celebrated Generals, Statesmen and Civilians, also of many of our most distinguished American ladies. The likenesses are admirable, having been taken from photographs by Brady.

This is the most costly gift plate ever presented by any publisher in the United States, having been produced at an expense of $10,000.

Every family should possess this truly national picture, and carefully preserve it, as it will transmit to future generations the men who have restored our great national unity. It is especially valuable, as it contains an excellent likeness of our late lamented President, introducing General Grant and his wife to Mrs. Lincoln. This costly plate is the first of a series which it is our intention to present to our regular subscribers.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER will be issued every Tuesday in New York.

It is stereotyped, and back numbers can be had by ordering the same of any News Agent.

Emigration to Mexico.

The French paper in this city, which has not only read but abused the license that its thoughtlessness has accorded it during the four cruel years just closed, to misrepresent, belittle, and malign this country, is now in sore travail about what it calls the revival of "filibustering." An elementary paper in Paris conducted as this French concern has been conducted here, under reversed circumstances, would not only be suppressed and suppressed, but its publishers and editors would have been exemplarily punished. The American nation did its authorities, however, have had more confidence in their ability than to resort to gaolbirding or even shutting up a gang of garliceaters, who, while they revolved among the small and none too fragrant cook shops of the city, really imagined they were doing something to form if not control public opinion. That they have done their best in the cause of falsehood and detraction, both to help the South and serve the perjurer who keeps his iron bed on the meek necks of their countrymen at home, is not to be doubted; if they will not do it for the love of the thing they are not wanting nor the will. Tools more abject and unscrupulous could not be found, and we hope they will soon be able to vegetate in the coulisses of the theatres, that little red ribbon in the button-hole, which in France is awarded to whoever has wit enough to escape being run over by a omnibus or a cabriolet.

We said this French organ is distressed about the "revival of filibusterism," and it is therefore the interposition of the national morality against what it denounces the "shameful and sinister designs" on Mexico. It appears that President Juarrez, of our sister Republic, is engaged in a severe struggle with a mongrel herd of Frenchmen, Belgians and Austrians, who have been trying for some time to deprive him of power, and to supplant him by an adventurer, one Max. Hapsburg, but they have not yet been wholly successful. Mr. Juarrez is still in the field, and is trying with patriotic energy to drive out the adventurers aforesaid. And, it is said, although there is no public authority for the statement, that he proposes to do this in part by inviting to Mexico such emigrants as may be supposed to sympathies with him in this laudable purpose. To them it is also said that he offers a little money and much land, and it is presumable that a considerable number of people here and in Europe may find it equally convenient to sell their interests and feelings to go. We know of nothing to prevent them. Their right is as indisputable to go, as was that which has brought over to this country four hundred thousand men and women from Ireland and Germany, during the past year. If any of them chose to join the Mexican army it is their own affair. Were we to credit the statements of this French paper and its mendacious contemporaries of European origin, we should be compelled to believe that the Republican Government was mostly made up of men who came here under precisely such circumstances as it is alleged that men, these very men included, are now going to Mexico.

President Juarrez may come here and buy arms if he likes precisely as the rebels bought arms in every country of Europe. Mr. Max. Hapsburg may do the same. If he has where withal to pay for them, he will get them. We have a large supply, not now necessary for use, and we may add, to say that we will not be sorry if President Juarrez can buy them and use them successfully in driving out the French, Austrian and Belgian filibustere who have been trying to make the Government of which he is the lawful head.

The United States knows but one authority in Europe, and that is not Mr. Max Hapsburg. We know, and the Senate of the United States has declared that it knows no Empire of Mexico, but only the Republic of Mexico; a Republic whose people have sympathies and attractics, and whose officers are recognised in our capitol and in our ports. The foreign adventurers in that country are unknown to us, except in their character of filibusters. We do not even concede to them the cheap distinction of "belligerents." We have no quarrel with France, and we should like to understand a little more about the "Stonewall," and the aid and comfort extended to it in French ports; with Austria we have no cause of difference, and as for Belgium, the efforts of its imbecile old king to make his daughter, Mrs. Hapsburg, an Empress, are simply ridiculous, and we know they receive no sympathy from the people of Belgium, who are obliged, under the continental system, to accept the dotard Leopold as King. If France, or Austria, or Belgium, or all the three together desire a quarrel with us, they can be obliged with one on the shortest notice; but no threats or theirs can make the Government of the United States recede from its distinct position as the friend of the Republic of Mexico. Nor can they influence President Johnson to interfere with the privilege which is asserted, and the right which must be included, that of expatriation. If any of our people disbanded volunteers, North or South, decide to emigrate to Mexico, they can go there without violating any individual obligation of their own towards this country, and without affording any cause of complaint on the part of other nations of the earth. We have the right to ask whether they intend to attach themselves to the fortunes of Maximilian or Juarez; but we cannot prevent them if they do either the one thing or the other, they have undoubtedly to have a claim upon the United States for protection as American citizens. We think it probable that they will not rather incline towards Juarrez. We should have a very low opinion of their sense and foresight if they did not. Mounting our Gallic counterpocay had long and none too fragrant cook shops of the city, really imagined they were doing something to form if not control public opinion. That they have done their best in the cause of falsehood and detraction, both to help the South and serve the perjurer who keeps his iron bed on the meek necks of their countrymen at home, is not to be doubted; if they will not do it for the love of the thing they are not wanting nor the will. Tools more abject and unscrupulous could not be found, and we hope they will soon be able to vegetate in the coulisses of the theatres, that little red ribbon in the button-hole, which in France is awarded to whoever has wit enough to escape being run over by a omnibus or a cabriolet.

An Inglorious End.

On the morning of the 10th of May, in a small patch of woods near Irwinville, Ga., about 75 miles south-east from Macon, and towards the confines of Florida, the fugitive rebel, Jeff. Davis, disguised in one of his wife's gowns, was captured by Lieut.-Col. Pritchard of the 4th Michigan cavalry. Hearing of the arrival of the Union forces in the neighborhood, it appears that he hastily put on female apparel, and ran for the woods. At first our men thought it was a woman, but the boots betrayed him, and, after brandishing a dagger, he surrendered. Reagan, the rebel postmaster, and several of his staff, were also captured at the same time.

The last rebel army to the eastward of the Mississippi river, that under Gen. Taylor, has surrendered to Gen. Canby. Every rebel capital, with the exception that of Texas, is now in possession of the national troops and under the government of military officers, who retain around them just enough troops to preserve order, achieve the national authority, and punish strolling bands of robbers and individual guerrillas. Our victorious armies themselves are on their homeward march. That of the south-west, under Sherman, is moving slowly and easily northward, and will soon report itself in Washington, having traversed triumphantly every Southern State east of the Mississippi, except Florida. Our public conveyances are crowded with soldiers, hearing their evidences of honorable discharge, bastening to their homes and to the pursuits of peace. The arsenals and manufactuers of arms, and the dockyards are relatively quiet, while economy and reduction of expenditures is the order of the day in every department of the Government. The recruiting booths have disappeared from the Park, and the long and sinister building in which the commissaries of the draft made out their lists for the conscription, is rapidly coming to decay. We never let us hope, to be used again. The plow is breaking up the hard trodden ground of the field of Gettysburg, Malvern hand under the feet of how many thousands of our brave soldiers —and it will soon be clothed once more in its accustomed garniture of corn. The rebellion is a impressing itself on every mind, and making itself felt in the mart and by the fireside. The men who fought it in the battle line, and the lands themselves disagreeably on the public attention are those arising from the presence of the Fraser-Trenholm agent, "Beverley," in the Confederate port of Nassau, and from the fact that the sole other pirate craft, the "Shenandoah," pirated and remained in Melbourne, after the news expected on our Pacific coast. They may still do some mischief; but it is something to know that if they do, the loss of our officers and crew will as certainly be hanged as pirates, as it is certain that Jeff. Davis, Johnson, & Co., are traitors, for President. They can offer no pretext that they are in the service of a Government of whatever kind, that is entitled to be treated as any of the Christendom where they present themselves. But we cannot expect such fair treatment from neutral nations, who were as prompt to recognise them as "belligerents." England and France and our "high and mighty friends," will be far slower to recognise these sea-rovers as "pirates."

CHIEF-JUSTICE CHASE has written a letter to the Union Convention of the Sixteenth Central Ward in Ohio, inclosing a contribution, in which he says: "I take this moment for making it, because just now many seem disposed to forget his great deservings, and remember only his recent convention with Johnston. But I did not, however regretted by many, approve that convention, nor, however, or even observe, his splendid services. His patriotism is no more doubted than his courage. No man's achievements here contributed more to the grand triumph of Union and freedom over rebellion and treason. His deeds among the archives and treasures of our own Ohio—as well as of our whole country."

With the consolidation of the nation, its enterprise and industry will receive a new impulse. Up from the ashes of the oppressive and invertive genius of our people was limited, for many causes, to one half of our territory. Now this could be expected from a nation which blindfolded all its labors. Ignorance and poverty are necessarily the result. Industry and enterprise, for the first time, has applied to the South and Southern staples, so that the product will, in a few years, be beyond all precedent.

The diabolical schemes of the rebels, of which the burning of New York was but one, and of which the robbery and murder in St. Albans, proved to be a consummation, and of which the assassination of Lincoln was but a subsidiary design, for he had their parallel in the now established plot to infect the Northern cities with the yellow fever. This was to be done by shipping large boxes of furniture, bedding and clothes of fever patients, in the belief that they would carry the deadly contagion to the North. The parties implicated were arrested, and the evidence in the case proved to be so strong that the Government decided to bring the parties to the Attorney-General for prosecution before the Court of General Assizes or Quarter Sessions. The prisoners were remanded for bail.

GEN. CANBY, in command of the army of the Mississippi, from Vicksburg to the Gulf of Mexico, has issued a General Order, which shows that the Emancipation Proclamation of the late President was not dictated by any "military necessity against the enemies," when some people affected to believe it to be, but a practical thing, ending slavery by the greatest blow as nothing the Gordian knot:

"All persons formerly held as slaves will be treated as every person is entitled to be, as rights of freedom, and such as desire their services will be required to pay wages. Care will be taken not to disturb promptly the connections now existing, and all colored persons who may desire to enter the employment are hereby referred to the persons by whom they are employed remaining their rights and agrees to compensate them for their services."

SENATOR SHERMAN, of Ohio, brother of the General, in a late speech on Abraham Lincoln, said:

"I do not now demand vengeance over the dead body of our murdered President, but I do demand that all he has promised shall be made good; that he be assisted as proclaimed the rebel flag and the rebel uniform shall be forever prohibited, and that now is the accepted time of the war. All the malignant passions of the rebels burn upon and feed them. They consecrated the war to enforce the doctrine of Secession, and now the States are welded in an indestructible bond. They commenced it to perpetuate the despotism of slavery, and now their slaves are free and they are disfranchised. Their haughty aristocracy sneered at the early life and homely manners of Abraham Lincoln, and now they deplore his death, because he would have been merciful to them. They mobbed and spit upon Andrew Johnson at Lynchburg, and now they must submit to such terms as he grants them. South Carolina led off in this drama of death, and she has been visited with destruction. The lessons taught to the infamous Booth at the execution of John Brown made him the assassin of the President, and that crime closed the gates of mercy to his teachers. All their early victories have only prolonged the war to complete their ruin. So striking a manifestation of Divine Providence in the affairs of men must excite the serious reflections of mankind, and it exalts the high position attained by Mr. Lincoln, that he always regarded himself but as the instrument of Almighty God. May his ashes rest in peace, and the spirit of his counsels yet guide us through the perils of the future."

The doleful apprehensions of foreigners and of a considerable part of our dyspeptic citizens, about guerrillas and the impossibility of bringing back the participants in the rebellion into a cordial support of the Union, are likely to prove equally fallacious. The military authorities of Virginia, Kentucky and Tennessee have declared all men in arms against the Union outlaws, and are proceeding to hang all they catch. The same regime will be adopted in the other lately rebellious States, and will effectually destroy the hopes of our European friends, who believe, or affect to believe, that we are to have a protracted guerrilla war, and who gloat with hypocritical horror over the scenes of cruelty and murder consequent on such a condition of things. In these respects they utterly misapprehend the character and temper of our people, even in the regions where the barbarism of slavery has worked its greatest demoralization. A North Carolina correspondent of the Herald reports a conversation which he had with the rebel General Hardee, at Greensborough, subsequent to the surrender of Johnston, in which the prevailing sentiment of the better class of Southerners is no doubt fairly expressed:

"Gen. Hardee received me in a very cordial, generous unreserved manner. He and I talked freely on all subjects of interest at the present time. In speaking of the war, he made this remarkable assertion: 'Sir, I accept this war as the providence of God. He intended that the slave should be free, and now he is free! Slavery was never a paying institution, I have often told my friends so. For instance, my wife owned about 100 negroes; 40 of the 100 were useless for work; yet she had to feed these 40 in order to get the work of the other 60. The negro will be worse off for this war. Will any of your Abolitionists of the North feed and clothe half-a-dozen little children in order to get the work of a man and woman? Sir, our people can pay the working negroes a fair compensation for their services, and let them take care of their own families, and then have as much left at the end of the year as we had under the old system.'

"'General, do you think we will soon have real peace?'

"'I do. I think the people of the South are anxious for it. They wanted it two years ago. I then saw that our cause could not succeed.'

"'Will we not have guerrilla warfare?'

"'So help me God, sir, if we do, I am willing and ready to fight to put an end to it.'

"'Is the same sentiment entertained by the other general officers who have been in the Confederate service?'

"'It is. I have not the slightest doubt but that they will use every means they can command to bring quietness and security again in the land. They will in no wise support those who do not obey the laws.'

"'How will it be in South Carolina?'

"'South Carolina is the worst whipped State in the Union.'

"'But will not her leading spirits control the masses?'

"'They, too, are crushed. She has no leading spirits now. Let me impress it upon you that the people of the South want to live in peace with the people of the North, and you will find they will do it. They will do it cheerfully, provided your Government does not resort to harsh measures. If it does resort to such measures, I cannot answer for the consequences. We staked our all on the success of our arms, and they failed us; and now we are willing to return to and live under the laws of the United States as we find them, although they may not be as we would desire to have them.'"

To the same effect is a letter from another rebel officer described as "on the staff of one of the ablest Confederate Generals," which came to light in the Boston Journal. We append an extract:

"The time has at length arrived when every honest Southern man may, without any scruples of conscience, come forward and give in his adhesion to the new order of affairs. And, indeed, I think it the duty of every good man to raise his voice emphatically in favor of the restoration of law and order in the shortest possible space of time. I think that those who, in taking arms against the old Government, were actuated by principle and not by passion, should, now that their efforts have proved useless, employ the same energies in quieting the disturbed elements of popular feeling and bringing the ignorant and wavering to an honest support of the new régime, I shall express freely my opinions to my fellow-prisoners whenever convenient, and endeavor to influence them as far as is possible. This war has been fought, not for the pulling down of one Government or the setting up of another, but for the solution of two great questions: First, that of State rights, and second, that of slavery; both these have now been brought to a final decision, and I do not find it expedient, nor do I feel inclined, longer to dispute the decision which has been so emphatically made. I do not think that we, either of the North or the South, should look with bitterness upon the past, or with passion to the future, and the blood that has been spilt will not have been shed in vain, but will serve to cement our national platform more firmly together than ever. Let bygones be bygones, I say. I intend to take the oath of allegiance as soon as it is offered to me, and shall leave prison a new man. I am still young and hopeful of the future. I go South to bury slavery and raise up new sources of wealth and prosperity."

At the commencement of the war, our respected and well affected uncle, J. Bull, under advice of his Mentor, the Times, very fussily and ostentatiously buttoned up his pockets, protruded his cheeks, pulled his hat over his eyes, and magisterially and gruffly told us that we had better not come to him for money to carry on our squabble—as the great war for nationality, republican institutions, and the extinction of human bondage was then irreverently called. Buttoning up the pockets was intended to be highly admonitary and reproving, and our uncle really supposed he was doing something very great in checking waywardness across the water. And he was not unnaturally a little amazed to find that nobody except the rebels called on him to untie his money bags. He consoled himself, however, with the notion that we would be obliged to go to him, sooner or later, and he carefully rehearsed the harsh and killing phrases in which he intended to repulse our applications. But two years, and three years, and even the fourth year of "the unhappy war" passed away, and yet the obnoxious and incorrigible Yankees not only abstained from begging money abroad, but went quietly to work, levied taxes, raised loans, and viciously put to shame all the melancholy prognostications of the British press. They maliciously refused to become bankrupt, and their armies was so mean-spirited as to fight persistently and uncomplainingly even when their pay was in arrears. And when Lee surrendered, and it became clear that the rebellion was moribund, so far so that even the British press could find no ray of hope for their Southern friends in the military situation, then the possible financial embarrasments of the country came in to comfort them. They rubbed their hands with secret delight, while they rolled up their eyes with poorly affected sympathy, over the "monetary prospects of the United States." "Now," they said, chokingly, "your real troubles begin! It is true you have annihilated an armed opposition of eight hundred thousand men, and it must be admitted that your forces have traversed in every direction a country as large as Europe, and fought terrific battles on land and sea, but you don't understand finance—you are absolutely ruined!" and, figuratively speaking, the convenient handkerchief of the hypocrite was applied to their overflowing eyes!

But the financial prognostications of our friends have come to grief in quite as exemplarily a manner as those which they ventured to promulgate about the war. Last week (ending May 6th) the subscriptions to the National loan amounted to more than $40,000,000 in the aggregate, and for May 9th, a single day, they ran up to over $15,000,000, only to be exceeded on the day following in the sum of over $17,000,000! On the 12th they again ran above $15,000,000. On the 13th to $15,500,000.

In the language of the penny-a-liners, "Comment is unnecessary!" There must, of course, be something of evil significance in these facts which will be duly pointed out to us by our prescient uncle, who seems to be utterly unconscious that he is making a portentous ass of himself in all that he says or writes about this country.

BOOK NOTICES, ETC.

Wright's Book; or, 3,000 Practical Receipts. New York: Dick & Fitzgerald.

That's it; or, Plain Teaching. New York: Dick & Fitzgerald.

Messrs. Dick & Fitzgerald have long been eminent for the number of the useful books they have published, and there is scarcely a branch of practical life they have not illustrated—among the most valuable are the two volumes at the head of this notice. The former contains over 3,000 Practical Receipts, forming a complete book of reference for cookary, pastry, preserving, pickleing, confectionary, distilling, perfumery, &c. Indeed, there is scarcely a department of human industry omitted.

"That's it; or, Plain Teaching," is, as it states, an encyclopædia of universal information, containing a large collection of curious and interesting facts in Nature, Art and Science. It is also illustrated with more then 1,000 wood engravings.

The Illustrated Handbook of Billiards. By Phelan and Berger. New York: Dick & Fitzgerald.

This is a very useful and reliable work on the fashionable game of the day—the two names of Phelan & Berger are sufficient guarantee of its excellence.

Historical View of the American Revolution. By G. W. Green. Boston: Ticknor & Fields.

The eminent publishers of Boston have performed a very acceptable work in publishing in one volume Mr. Green's admirable lectures, given in 1863. In their collected shape they cannot fail to be popular.

Graven Thoughts of a Country Parson. Second Series. Ticknor & Fields.

Another collection of every day sermons, ingeniously beguiled of sermonizing. They achieve the difficult feat of being readable and moral at the same time.

The National Hymn. By Clara M. Brinkerhoff. New York: Wm. A. Pond & Co., 547 Broadway.

A dignified and spirited composition.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—A gentleman named Reffelt has recently patented an ingenious invention of frames and balls, by which the problems of arithmetic are solved with magical facility. It is intended for schools. The apparatus is manufactured at 490 Hudson street.

—— The subscriptions to the National loan for the week ending May 6th were over $40,000,000.

—— Gov. Andrew, of Massachusetts, has had presented to him the original of Lee's impudent and unrepentant address to his army, on the occasion of his surrender. It is suggested that the Government place the manuscript in some historical collection, together with an autograph letter of Benedict Arnold, in which that "gentleman," who went over to the enemies of his country in a former war, endeavored to persuade some of his countrymen to become traitors like himself.

—— The late President Taylor's son, a Major in the rebel army, has been paroled for ten days at Louisville, in order to enable him to leave the United States—he having refused to take the oath of allegiance.

—— Now Jeff. Davis is caught, pains should be taken not to wound his sensitive Southern honor. He should at least be allowed to express his preference, whether to be hung for treason or complicity in murder.

—— Just before the last Presidential election Mr. A. Belmont, Chairman of the National Democratic Committee, make a public offer to bet $10,000 that if Mr. Lincoln should be re-elected, the war would out-last his second term. What does Mr. B. think about the matter now?

—— The Stuyvesant pear tree in Third avenue is in full blossom for the 220th season.

—— An American artist, Mr. J. Heads, long established in London, has recently obtained some good commissions for the Prince of Wales. Mr. Heade is quite unrivalled in the more gorgeous kind of ornithological studies, as humming-birds, &c. He spent some years in South America.

—— Gen. Carleton, commanding in New Mexico, keeps an account current with the savage tribes which he is sent to keep in order. The report for 1864 shows 12,284 sheep and 2,472 horses taken from the Indians, and 4,250 sheep and 26 horses taken by the Indians.

—— Mrs. Moulton's concert, at Mr. Jerome's private theatre, resulted in adding $1,200 to the funds of the Woman's Infirmary, at Washington Heights. Mrs. Moulton sailed for Europe, last week, where, by her fine abilities and graceful manners, she will shine to great advantage in the social circle.

—— As the Providence Journal well says: "The rebels can't get rid of Booth. He is their man, and will stick to them for ever. He was employed to do their work, and he will be the representative of their cause to the end of time."

—— The editor of the Ibury Herald, in Mississippi, has furnished to the press a record of the daily deaths at the rebel prison-pen in Andersonville, Ga., from the 1st of March, 1864, to the 10th of March, 1865, a little over one year. The total number was nearly 13,000, or more than 1,000 a month.

—— The new three cent pieces authorised by Act of Congress, March 3d, are making their appearance. They are legal tender in sums not exceeding 60 cents, are intended to replace the three cent shinplasters, the further issue of which is prohibited. The size of the piece is precisely that of the dime, which may not have been wholly forgotten. The obverse bears the head of Liberty, with the legend "United States of America," and the date "1865." The reverse has the Roman numerals "III," surrounded by a wreath. The edge of the coin is plain, unlike that of the ten-cent piece, which is milled.

—— The great National Cemetery for the reception of the soldiers slain at Gettysburg, is rapidly progressing, and it is believed will be completed this summer.

—— Edwin Booth, in a private letter to a friend in Washington, announces his determination to quit the stage for ever.

—— Maj.-Gen. Terry has been rewarded with the honor of a Brigadiership in the regular army, being the only volunteer thus distinguished.

—— The striped bug, so destructive in melon and cucumber beds, may be effectually got rid of by cooping a hen with a brood of small chickens near the vines. The little chicks will hunt and destroy the bugs, without injury to the plants.

—— The Department of Agriculture is in the receipt, from Japan, of a sample of sugar-cane, somewhat resembling sorghum, for propagation and testing in this climate. It is cut in sections of three joints, one of which is planted in a hill, thus growing in layers instead of seed. It was forwarded by Thomas Hogg, an officer of this Government at Yokohama, who deems it worthy of trial in this climate. He says it is extensively grown there, especially on the Island of Kiusiu, and thinks it will succeed here wherever Indian corn comes to maturity.

—— The rage for relics in this country is something astounding. A respectably dressed man was noticed the other day putting in his pocket a brick from the wall in front of Mr. Lincoln's house; and this is but one of ten thousand follies. The entire stairway upon which Col. Ellsworth was killed, in Alexandria, has been cut into chips and carried away. The tree, at the foot of which Sickles shot Key, in Washington, has been barked and cut until it is dead. The oak tree, under which Gen. Grant talked with Pemberton and arranged the terms of the surrender of Vicksburg, has been annihilated, and recently a party dug into the ground ten feet for the roots of the historic oak. An elm tree which Abraham Lincoln planted stands in front of his old house in Springfield. Of course it will be torn in pieces and destroyed.

—— Why is the Southern Confederacy like a maiden lady? Because she is enjoying a single State—Texas.

—— A barber of Savannah says he has used up more than $100,000 of rebel money for shaving-paper.

—— The Louisville (Ky.) Journal says: "The doom of slavery is sealed. There cannot be a question about it. It is no matter whether we like it or don't like it. Its continued existence in this State is an absolute impossibility. The attempt to prop it up and save it, now that the avalanche is so near the base of the mountain, is to act the part of the old man who shakes his staff at the descending glacier, and expects thereby to stop it."

Obituary.—Edwin J. De Haven, a lieutenant in the United States Navy, died recently in Philadelphia, in the 45th year of his age. He has been repeatedly noticed for his gallantry and skill, and was also celebrated for his fine scientific attainments. He was attached to the Washington Observatory, and constructed the famous ocean charts for which the rebel Maury received so much credit. He was selected to command the expedition to the North Sea in 1850, and on his return was employed in the Survey Department on the Southern coast. In 1857, his eyesight became so much impaired that he was compelled to retire from active service.

—— By the last number of the Overland Gazette of Port Louis, Mauritius, intelligence was received of the death, by dropsy, of William V. Marks, at Tamatave, Madagascar. His name will often be mentioned in the history of an island destined soon to become of importance in our foreign relations. Born at Salem, Mass., he went out to Madagascar some 18 years ago to join an uncle who had been there some 40 years. Mr. Marks acquired a thorough acquaintance with the language and customs of the various tribes, married and settled there. He was a great friend of the late King Radama II., who appointed him his Secretary for Foreign Affairs; and even after the murder of the King he retained much influence with the chiefs.

Foreign.—An English temperance paper of a dismal temperament, estimates that there are half a million drunkards in Great Britain.

—— The latest news from Caprera states that Gen. Garibaldi has perfectly recovered from his wound, and walks freely without limping, though he still uses a cane. The General is surrounded by the members of his family.

—— The King of Italy intends sending to the International Exhibition at Dublin a topaz weighing several pounds and eight or nine inches long, having on it a beautiful engraving of "The Last Supper." The committee are expected to provide, at their own expense, a suitable show-case, plate-glass, and an iron safe, with iron railings like a cage all round.

—— News comes to us from London of the death, in his 54th year, of Gen. Kmety, who was one of the leaders of the Hungarian rebellion, and who, with Kossuth, found a refuge in Turkey. Kmety, after the failure of the Hungarian struggle for independence, entered the Turkish army, and, under the name of Ismail Pasha, took a prominent part in the defence of Kars. Since the Crimean war Kmety has lived in England.

—— Carl Kiss, the celebrated sculptor, died at Berlin on the 24th April. He is well-known by his statue, the Amazon, which was exhibited in the London Exhibition of 1862, and in the New York Crystal Palace. It has been extensively copied on a smaller scale.

—— At about the same time when our nation was mourning over the death of its ruler, the Russian people were informed of the death of one to whom they had looked as their future monarch. The eldest son of the Czar died at Nice on the 23d of April, and the promising ability shown by the young man was such as to render his death a real calamity.

—— The London Times, of April 26, says: "Emigration has commenced at this early period of the year from the mining districts of the Kingdom, and in South Wales it is beginning to be a frequent occurrence for 40 or 50 hands to leave at every pay day from the principal iron and coal works of the district. A few emigrate to Australia, Canada, New Zealand, and other British colonies, but at least 90 per cent. are bound for the Northern States." The Cork Constitution adds: "Emigration has, within the last few days, experienced unwonted intensity. Notwithstanding the numbers carried out by the last National and Inman boats, there are supposed to be 1,500 at this moment waiting in Queenstown, hundreds of whom will, even after the next dispatch, have to wait still further. They come from Galway, Mayo, Limerick, Clare, Kerry and the west of this county."

—— The Suez canal is not yet by any means finished. The two ends of the canal, that is to say the works required for the entry from the two seas, remain yet to be built, and it is exactly these which the English engineers declared to be the most important and impracticable part of the enterprise. There never was any doubt in any one's mind that the ditch through the level sands of Egypt could be dug from one end to the other, if the money was provided to pay the workmen, nor even that water enough could be found to supply it; this, in fact, has been accomplished, and it is only to see his central ditch, with three or four feet of water in it, that M. de Lessep has invited delegates from all parts of the world. The ends of the two seas are yet to be built, and the practicability of their serving as entries is yet to be proven.

—— In Italy and Germany the satires and burlesques on the French Emperor's "Life of Cæsar" sell more readily than the work itself, and are vastly more popular.

—— The French are in the habit, and not altogether without reason, of asserting their infantry to be unsurpassed in the armies of the world, but as marksmen, confessedly, no troops are worse. One of the Paris journals devotes a long article to the subject, in which we find it stated that, at Solferino, it required not less than 15,000,000 of cartridges to "knock over" 10,000 Austrians, thus proving that it took 1,500 bullets, which represent a weight of 200 pounds, to kill a single man.

—— The organ of the English Tories, the London Standard, says, in speaking of the defeat of the Confederates, "It cannot be denied that whatever may be the ultimate event, to them belong the moral trophies of the war." We trust that England will soon have an opportunity of welcoming a large portion of these gentlemen, and that they will take their "moral trophies" with them.

—— A handsome testimonial has been presented to Prince Gortschakoff by the Russian navy in memory of his diplomatic triumph over the Western Powers in 1863. The testimonial is in the shape of a Corinthian column, at the foot of which are inscribed the dates of the Prince's three famous dispatches (April 14, July 1, and Aug. 26). The column rests on four rocks armed with cannon. On the pedestal is represented the Pervenets, the first iron-plated vessel built by the Russian Government for the defence of Cronstadt.

—— The Consul-General for the negro republic of Liberia, Mr. Gerard Ralston, and the Portuguese Ambassador, Count Lavradio, have just signed a treaty of commerce between the two States which contains the following clause:—"Art. 10.—As, by the laws of the kingdom of Portugal and of the republic of Liberia, the slave trade is assimilated to piracy, the vessels or subjects of both the aforesaid countries that may be found employed in this infamous trade shall be tried and punished by the courts of their respective countries according to the aforesaid laws." It is remarkable that the two negro republics of Hayti and Liberia were the first States which set the example of introducing this provision into an international treaty of commerce, though England, America, and other States have long declared the slave trade to be piracy by their statute law, and several of the Powers have made special treaties for the suppression of the slave trade. The republic of Liberia, as our readers are probably aware, owed its existence to the efforts of the American Colonization Society, which has from time to time, since it was established, some 40 years ago, sent out large numbers of emancipated negroes from the United States, and settled them on the coast of Africa, to form an independent political community. The President is now Mr. Warner since the death of the late President Benson, who was an able and enlightened man. The population is about half a million, chiefly speaking English. Their little capital city, named Monrovia, is a place of some trade, and furnished with churches, schools, colleges, newspapers, and other civilised institutions, besides being the seat of Government, with a Senate and a House of Representatives holding session there. This Republic has no standing army, but all its citizens, except clergymen and judges, are bound to serve in the militia, to which the Emperor of the French has presented 1,500 muskets; while the sole vessel of the Liberian navy, a schooner of five guns, is a gift from the Queen of Great Britain. It is gratifying to hear good accounts of this experiment of self-government for the negro race.

—— The John Ericsson, the first Swedish monitor, has been launched at Stockholm. She measures 205 ft. long by 46 ft. wide. The side plating is five inches thick, and around the tower, where the cannons are, it is 12 inches, as is also that which protects the rudder. The vessel will be provided with six steam-engines.

In 1861 the King of Belgium accredited a minister to the Government of President Juarrez, and in 1862 a treaty of the most liberal character, and based upon the most advantageous terms, was concluded. Nothing up to that time had occurred on the part of the people or the Government of Mexico to give the slightest cause of offence to the people or to the King of Belgium; nor has anything been done since that time by the people or the Government of Mexico to change those relations.

Yet to-day we witness the fact that armed forces, openly enlisted and dispatched without hindrance from Belgium, composed of officers who still hold their rank and position in the Belgian army, and of soldiers who still retain their citizenship as Belgian subjects, are now in Mexico engaged in making war upon the legitimate and rightful Government of that country—recognised and honored as such by the United States—and in shedding the blood of a people whose only offence is that they are defending the free institutions and the independence of their native land. Stripped of sophistry, this is to-day the position Belgium occupies towards Mexico, and, we have a right to add, towards the United States.

If Belgium has no cause of complaint against Mexico, what right has she to make war upon that country? And, in any case, what right has she to interfere in the civil war now in progress there? The position of Maximilian, as the son-in-law of the King of Belgium, confers no right, at least, in this age of the world. Wars are not now made for the benefit of individuals; it is the interest of the people that is to be consulted. Nor is there any excuse for this intervention to be found in the interests of Belgium. On the contrary, Belgium has been supposed to be a Power whose interests clearly dictated a policy of uniform neutrality. We do not imagine that King Leopold can contemplate an exception to this rule in a case where the United States may possibly be drawn in to be a party, or that he can desire that Belgium should assume the position of chief defender of Maximilian in Mexico, particularly after the United States has successfully emerged from a vital struggle in which no principle has been found to be a more necessary part of its foreign policy than that no European intervention can be permitted in the civil wars on this continent.

It is, therefore, a source of the greatest surprise that so prudent a people as the Belgians, should have allowed themselves, simply on account of private relationships personal to the King alone, to have been drawn into a position which may prove not only very embarrassing, but even dangerous. Some official correspondence on this subject has passed between the Mexican Minister and his Government, in which the feelings of the Mexican Government with regard to this matter are shown, and which also shows that the subject has excited grave debate in the Belgian legislative chambers, and is the source of serious apprehensions in the minds of intelligent writers in that country. Should President Juarez, a little later, choose to retaliate, he will have it in his power, perhaps, to inflict as serious a damage upon Belgian commerce as has been inflicted upon that of the United States by the privateers which have been fitted out in England, only in this case President Juarrez will have the advantage that his privateers will be those of a lawful, legitimate and recognised Government.

In fact the only safe course for foreign nations is to withdraw their forces entirely from Mexico. The principle upon which they are there is unsound; and if Maximilian cannot safely rely upon his own alleged subjects, the Mexicans, for support, then it is the best evidence in the world that the people of Mexico desire neither to adopt an imperial form of Government, nor to have an Austrian to rule over them.—N. Y. Herald.

SURRENDER OF LEE'S ARMY.—COLLECTING THE CAPTURED REBEL MUSKETS AT BURKESVILLE STATION, VA., PREVIOUS TO SENDING THEM NORTH.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, J. BECKER.

SCENES IN RICHMOND, VA.

Now that the war is over it is the wish of all true Americans to let bygones be bygones, and when a few of the leading traitors are punished, to forgive, even if our deceived households will not allow us to forget. Still human nature is human nature, and the most magnanimous and Christian of our readers will, no doubt, feel a half suppressed glow of satisfaction at the illustrations we publish to-day, representing the interior of the infamous Libby Prison, now filled with rebel prisoners, among whom there are over 100 of the most desperate criminals in the South—being convicts who were released from jail on condition of serving in the rebel ranks.

Another sketch represents a scene in front of the prison, when the Secesh ladies are visiting their friends. Our Artist says they generally bring some refreshments in small baskets with them, and not being allowed to enter the prison, the baskets are handed up by the grated outside, with such remarks as those:

"William, I have brought you some dinner!"

"Say, Mary, can't you get me out of the cursed hole?"

"No, Ben, is that you? When did you get in?"

"Sam, tell mother that I am here!"

Now and then some impertinent rebel salutes one of the colored soldiers in such complimentary terms as these:

"Say, you black ape, go and wash your face!"

The third sketch is one belonging to the old regime of Davidsonville—since it represents the navy hybrid in that black hole of Richmond congallant fellows had for washing, &c. As the suffering is over, and we have triumphed, we will say nothing about it, certainly, which must have been known to Gen. Lee.

TRIAL OF THE CONSPIRATORS.

THE secrecy in which the proceedings have been conducted has rendered it a matter of difficulty to obtain sketches and information respecting the great trial. We are happy to state, however, that, through the attention of officials and the pluck of our agents in "going evidence," we are able to hold our own in this, as in every other public event that has heretofore claimed the attention of the chronicler.

The criminals are confined in chains, in separate cells, in the Penitentiary Building, at the Arsenal, Washington. A large room in the second story has been fitted up for the court-room. It is large enough to hold 100 persons, and is in the north-east corner of the building, and has four windows covered with grated iron bars. The room has a high ceiling, and except the tables, chairs and matting upon the floor, and half a dozen benches, is perfectly plain. The walls are white, the whole building having been newly renovated. No maps, pictures or anything is to be seen, save the hastily constructed pine furniture needed by the court.

Judge-Advocate Holt presides at the court, which is ranged around a long table, upon the north side of the room. Parallel to it are the tables for the official reporters, who are sworn, and will reduce the testimony each day to writing.

Maj.-Gen. Hartauff has command of the jail and its surroundings, and his dispositions are such that it would be impossible for any attempt to get possession of the prisoners by a mob to succeed.

His forces are encamped just outside the outer walls, while thick cordons of sentries surround the red brick building which confines the wretched criminals, who, in chains, with sacrifices over their heads, are already undergoing a living death. They are not allowed any communication with the outside world, and the guards who feed them are not allowed to converse with them on any pretence.

The padded mesha, covering their entire head except the mouth, are put on to prevent them from committing suicide. A sentinel over each one attends to them day and night. All are very much dejected, and fear that at any moment they may be executed by the people.

THE REBEL ARMY OF GEN. LEE STACKING ARMS.

To our readers who have followed, week by week, for four years, the varying fortune of the great struggle from which we have just emerged, but whose final result no rational being could for a moment doubt, the sketch we give on this page will be truly welcome. For the surrender of Gen. Lee was to the rebels what the flight of Napoleon from Waterloo was—the solemn surrender of the accursed cause, which, while it has made us the observed of all observers, has done so at such a fearful cost of our best blood, saying nothing of the suffering caused by the waste of money, that it will ever be considered as "the baptism of blood" of our great Republic. It was a gushing fitting punishment for that over-rated soldier and cold blooded rebel, Gen. Lee, who, by what merit had been raised to the bad eminence of Commander-in-Chief, that he should have to undergo the painful ordeal of surrendering the right arm of the rebellion, and our Artist has recorded that event in the sketch we publish of his troops stacking their arms. The place where it occurred is about four miles west of Mallory's Church, which is in the southern part of Buckingham county, on the Lynchburg and Farmville road, on the north side of the Appomattox, five miles north west of Farmville. Our Artist says that "if the stacking of arms was humiliating to Gen. Lee it was ordinary very gratifying to the men."

CHARQUI.—In many regions of the pampas and llanos of this vast continent, cattle have long been slaughtered for their fat and hides alone. Good beef has been given over to the catchers; and when these winged gleidons have filled themselves, the bones remaining, when dried by the sun exposure, become the only fuel which the gauchos, or wild herdsmen, are for cooking their meals. The North American grass lands—the prairies—and treats corresponding to the pampas or llanos of South America were well tenanted by indigenous horned animals—bisons, improperly called buffaloes—when the Spaniards first set foot on the new continent. The magnificent grass-lands of South America were devoid of those animals, and indeed were scarcely tenanted by large animals of any sort. Wild horses and wild oxen have increased prodigiously all over those plains. Any number of either may be had for the trouble of catching, and referring solely to the horned cattle, this circumstance explains the phenomenon of beef at six cents per pound in the Cuban market. Charqui (whence comes our word jerked), when prepared as usual in South America, is not very agreeable to look upon. It appears under two forms, the novelty of two different modes of preparation. In either case the beginning is similar. The flesh is cut away from the bones in long ribbon-like strips, then dried. In one case it is acted to a different degree. Charqui dulce, or sweet charqui, is slightly sprinkled with salt, then sun-dried, and rolled into the form of a hard cylinder. The other sort is more highly salted—corned, as we should term it—then withdrawn from pickle, the excess of moisture squeezed out, finally, the meat rolled similarly to the charqui dulce. Both sorts have been brought here on trial; and hitherto popular appreciation has rather inclined to the fully salted variety, though, weight for weight, it is not so nutritious as the charqui dulce, and hence not so profitable.

HARRIET HOSMER'S bronze statue of Col. Benton has arrived in St. Louis, and will be publicly inaugurated at an early day. The Legislature of Missouri appropriated $2,500 for this statue in 1860, and the remainder sum needed for the work was subscribed by individuals.

THE CAPTAIN:

A Legend of the Navy.

BY ALFRED TENNYSON.

He that only rules by terror
Doth grievous wrong
Deep as Hell I count his error,
Let him hear my song:

Brave the Captain was; the seamen
Made a gallant crew,
Gallant sons of English freemen,
Sailors bold and true.
But they hated his oppression,
Stern he was and rash;
So for every light transgression
Doomed them to the lash.

Day by day more harsh and cruel
Seemed the Captain's mood,
Secret wrath, like smothered fuel,
Burnt in each man's blood.
Yet he hoped to purchase glory,
Hoped to make the name
Of his vessel great in story
Wheresoe'er he came.
So they passed by capes and islands,
Many a harbor mouth,
Sailing under palmy high lands,
Far within the South.

On a day when they were going
O'er the vast expanse,
In the North, her canvas flowing,
Rose a ship of France.
Then the Captain's color heightened,
Joyful came his speech;
But a cloudy gladness lightened
In the eyes of each.
"Chase," he said; the ship flew forward,
And the wind did blow
Stately, lightly, went the Norward,
Till she neared the foe.

When they looked at him they hated,
Had what they desired:
Mute with folded arms they waited—
Not a gun was fired.
But they heard the foeman's thunder
Roaring out their doom;
All the air was torn in sunder,
Crashing went the boom,
Spars were splintered, decks were shattered,
Bullets fell like rain,
Over mast and deck were scattered
Blood and brains of men.
Spars were splintered—decks were broken—
Every mother's son—
Down they dropt—no word was spoken—
Each beside his gun.

On the decks, as they were lying,
Were their faces grim;
In their blood, as they lay dying,
Did they smile on him.
Those in whom he had rehance
For his noble name,
With one smile of still defiance
Sold him unto shame.

Shame and wrath his heart confounded,
Pale he turned and red,
Till himself was deadly wounded,
Falling on the dead.

Dismal error! fearful slaughter!
Years have wandered by—
Side by side, beneath the water
Crew and Captain lie,
There the sunlit ocean tosses
O'er them mouldering,
And the lonely seabird crosses
With one watt of the wing.

The Night-Express Train.

A STORY TOLD BY A RAILROAD MAN.

IN TWO ACCIDENTS.

ACCIDENT THE SECOND—HE SEES HER THE LAST TIME.

It was many, weary months before I again got about. My arm was broken in two places, and my breast was beat internally, in a manner that the doctor's say, will yet cause my death. She was not injured in the least, only stunned and frightened. I remember the first question that I asked, when I came to my senses, was, not of my own condition, but concerning her. I had fallen underneath, in the soft, yielding sand, and would, doubtless, have escaped with only a bruise or so, only her weight broke my arm and crushed my side. She had been carried away to a neighboring farm-house, and I was sent back on the engine of a night train, to the city of which I have spoken.

I lingered along for some time, got better and worse, and worse and better, for the matter of a year or more, and at length, feeling sufficiently strong to go about my work, applied for a position. It was only after much persuasion and many promises that an engine was at length given me. But it wasn't spright!y. She, battard and bruised, had been degraded into a common station dredge, and this new one I had, I could not agree with. Myself or it was continually out of order. Scarcely a trip did we make, but what something broke, or my patience was outraged at the ill manner it worked. After a month or two, I gave up in despair, and went on as baggage master on the night train, as it was called, that is, "the Night Express," a through train, and a very rapid one.

For more than six years, my life was like the flowing of deep water, so quiet and monotonous, and withal accompanied with so little effort. I was on the middle division—there was scarcely any local travel, the baggage was all booked and stowed at either end of the line—I handled but little, and those small pieces, and my soverest task was that of keeping awake. For, every other night, I took the train about nine o'clock, and left it about four in the morning.

We had very long baggage cars on this train, and usually, the trunks, and valises, and carpet-bags through, were stowed in the forward part of the car, and in the back part were put the mail bags. We carried the through mail from the car, ay to the larger phaeton on the road, going west, and picked up the bags at the same stations for the city, going east.

These cars, though apparently slender, being so long and narrow for their length, were built very compactly and strong, for the traffic of the train was very extensive, as it was a favorite one with through passengers.

On each end of the car there was a small office, that had a wide shelf and some pigeon holes in it. I never knew for what those were intended—for though there was labeled—"Conductor's office," I never knew a conductor yet to use one.

For three long years this, I did a very easy life, gradually increasing my store for the wintry day of old age, and believing that I had finally struck my mission in life. I needed no consideration because it was humble, though I could have found some, in the fact that the world makes use of more little men than it does of great ones.

I don't care about being very particular as to dates, or time, for neither are very necessary, but it was about the year eight years after the accident, that I took my train, at the usual place and time, going east. It had been a growing lively all day, but the snow was light and flaky, and did not impede the motion of the train, so we were on time. The train would have passed safely, the holders of the road, for it was a long one and well filled with passengers, while my territory, the baggage car, was by far weak and light, but I look at and think, what is I had had the handling of so many large trunks, for it seemed as if some strong party had been delayed at the depot, or until mid-winter, and were just making their way home.

I took the baggage train from my mate, stowed away what few pieces were put on, pulled to the door of the car, spread my blankets over my feet, and with my feet towards the red little demon of a stove, lay down when the train moved on.

It was not quite an hour's run altogether to the next station, and I think I must have been dozing, for I was abruptly startled by a terrible slam or crash, as if there had been some sharp concussion, or something brittle had broken suddenly. I arose hastily and rubbed my eyes. I can tell you, there is nothing that will startle one quicker than to hear a mysterious noise on a train of cars, when he has once been caught in an accident, where he has been fairly escaped with but a life. I looked eagerly about me. The trunks were all right, piled as before and systematically in order. I took the ear—the outer door was closed—we were moving along smoothly and rapidly, and I heard nothing at that presumptuous hour that betokens an abatement of speed, preparatory to a full stop. After a moment, I lay down again. Credit! came the philosophic-like reasoning, it is now being awake, I knew what it was. The door of the conductor's office in the forward part of the car, had popped open, had slammed back, and the movement of the train had brought it sharply together again, but not strong enough to latch it. There are long springs towards which it has a perversion. The slam of a door, the creak of a door and a heavy footfall behind me. I went forward, stumbling over or the baggage in my way, and latched the refractory door—that is, I meant to latch it and thought I latched it, for I am under swear that I did, or wouldn't, for neither is a door nor a latch a sectional thing—yet latch or no latch, door or no door, I think I got up three times during the next hour and a half to fasten that door. And I was engaged in a fruitless endeavor to secure a string through the keyhole and the handle of a trunk, when we drove into the station, where, more than eight years before, I had first been set on lawful duty, when together and myself, had stumbled even up to the very portals of death.

I had never passed this station without thinking of her, her mute-born beauty, and her rash suicidal career, which had so nearly cost me my life. And there so often thinking of her, and having, besides, my work ears as a never ceasing reminder, I had been longing to be where I did know what her life had been during the eight years and more passed away.

I hoped everything for the good, when I remembered her beauty.

I feared everything for her unhappiness when I remembered her rashness and her temper.

Often I had, by her memory, to reflect upon the occasion of a woman who marries where her heart is not, for I can say that of what I am sure can have no correct conception, who yields to one that she hates, whatever to one that she loves is given only because she loves him; my sympathy gave large towards her, and I came daily to wish that I could find her in my range of travel, and had once shielded her from death, so for ever afterwards, I could shield her from what she thought was worse than death.

This was always a busy station—three or four connections were made here, from the north and south, from the south-east and south-west, but tonight, either because the lateness hinked more freely or the rapidly falling flakes of snow deceived the eye, or I was wider awake than usual, there seemed to be much more moving to and fro, and shouting and hurrying of feet. I looked up and down the front platform, spoke to several acquaintances who passed me, did my duty by the few pieces of baggage that had to go out, and pulled the door abut, and stretched myself out on my box.

There seemed to be some uncertainty about starting, as if the steam had given out, or a brake had been left on, for we went ahead a little, then backed up for a fresh start and went ahead again, while the engine gave two or three times those sharp, successive barks as if it was impatient to be going. But I heard the station master in an authoritative tone of voice, cry out, "Hold on," when we stopped, backed up once more and stood still. Then a train of cars, came a thumping at my car door. I am always impatient with travellers who come just exactly on time, or a moment too late, so I made no haste to get to my feet, until it suddenly struck me that perhaps some of the dignitaries of the road might be in the case, else why was the station master so imperative. But the door had been rudely shoved open before I had time to think these far. I heard one curse, and "shut it," whereupon "I must shenzhe," and "most horribly," amongst a group of men who had evidently shoved my door. A crowd was rapidly collecting around them, and my wonder was momentarily increased, for each one as he came up unprofessedly nudged his neighbor with his elbow, and looked from one another into the car. Foremost amongst them all, was the conductor, who, as he entered hastily into the car, nodded to me, but said nothing, a policeman with bright eyes and rapid motions, and an old gentleman, who I knew by his air was the one that fell upon it. His hands were crossed over his breast in a resigned way, but his expression of agony found its way to his face, and hurt his brow as if with a physical pain. As the light from the conductor's lantern flashed full in my face, one eyes met, and he started so suddenly that his folded arms fell by his side.

"Not in here! Not in here!" he said, quickly. "Why here? Make haste if you must. Do?"

As he spoke, I could see the same face, that I had seen once before, and I knew, by recalling, and it showed the same agony and the same horror.

"We will make it thorough and complete, sir, Complete," said the policeman, as all three stepped into the car, the conductor to be aided, as or explaining his conduct to the old man. "It is too easy to be gainsayed, and I shall leave nothing. It would be complete."

The quick eye of the trained officer ran over every trunk with a professional speed, and into every corner with a practiced and thorough glance. His quick sight, aided by the lantern of the conductor. They went out at the forward door and back, and I heard the footfall of the engineer. On their way back, they caught sight of my unfortunate strung and the aggravating door.

It was severely fastened! and not until some effort did the many lock yield to the key and disclose an empty space beyond. Examining the door, I asked the conductor what all of this meant. The short, quick reply was then turned quickly towards me, and they both answered at once, the first:

"A desperate runaway!" and the second,

"No harm to you, sir."

I shut the door, with a sense of relief to know that I was safe, and latched, when they turned away from me, passed out of the car by the rear door, and, as I suppose, through the train. I saw no more of them, for I was soon fast asleep again on the ground, with a lantern, looking into every trunk and wheel.

But I did not long sought could be found there!

Once more I closed the outer door, fastened it with the strap, and mumbled myself out upon my box, and I have no doubt, revelled once more, to explain the recent occurrence. That it had been reformatory and had done me good, I verily believe, for the old man's look beside that too painfully, but that she was blameless, whatever the cause, was my own wishes for her good made me too certain of.

I imagined her in the luxurious home to which the old man had taken her, and I hoped it was so, and, at the same time, most miserable object. I thought him harsh and her patient. She, living under compulsion, and I knew that I was full of caprices, looking forward with pleasure and hope to only one moment of her being, the time of her escape, and I knew mine also, for I thought that the one single thought, and that thought a misery, had led to the attempt, and the fear of its success sure. I could put no worse construction than this upon what I had seen. How fearfully I misjudged that fearful design!

We were under way again, and swinging along at a happy pace, but the clock of the whole as a dreary one, for the snow was falling fast, and the office done, by their monotonous music, sing me to sleep. As often as I would close my eyes so often would I see that face, and the look of fear that was aware, staring into the cold blackness of the car that the rays of my lamp could not penetrate, and I would start from my half doze before me, so plainly that I brushed my hand before my eyes, as if driving away cobwebs. The figure of a hooded woman, with long, bright hair, flowing down to her feet, with her hands crossed and her eyes penetrating the darkness, and the expression of blackness weeping, while still further in the darkness, from one of the side windows, looked the shrieking face of a child, and I heard the piercing, clutching complacently at the wreck he had wrought. A vision disturbed by a loud crash—that terrible cry of real agony—that fearful fact as it was, and I sprang to my feet.

Meaning to come up gradually to kindness, and prompted by an uncertain feeling that I cannot explain, although I think it to some line of dignity or lecturing, I went on:

"We do not always our own torments, and fashion our lives in misery or happiness."

"We do not," she cried impatiently. "We are the creatures of circumstances, subjected to our father's caprice—others who are stronger than we, who would mould our lives according to their will and not to our own, and we are helpless in our estate. But they are not my sins, they are his, and he must answer for them. In the halls or the ballet that stays guilty, or the heart and hand that guides them? I have been the knife" she exclaimed, drawing herself up and looking from eye that shone with almost maniac gleam. "I have been the knife, and I have cut deep; but his has been the hand that guided me."

She sank down again weeping, as if overcome by the weight of some fearful remembrance. I took her hand in mine to soothe her, and spoke some words of kindness, when pleading once more, she went on:

"But you will not give me up to my pursuers, will you? Promise me that. Take me away—far away. Wrap your arms about me as you did, not long ago, and protect me. Save me. I beseech you, by the arms which we took from me by the memory of your mother, who, like me, was a woman, save me from worse than what you have already saved me. Help me away. Don't even in whispers say that I am here. Take me to the great city, where no one shall imagine that I am as a rain-drop falls into the ocean unrecognizable. Don't give me up. I have been wicked—wrong—unwomanly—but I am now young yet—for years to grow better, and deserve at least a corner of heaven!"

All the exalone, pleading voice, the falling eyes, that said volumes more than the lips. If her life had been in my hands, she could not have been more earnest and appealing. And while my sympathy already all hers, it needed no such further incentive to complete my resolve. Give her up! Shield her! Save her! Guide me, you have placed in her hands, and her heavenly eyes looking into mine! Would I have thrown my own child to the wolves?

What could she have done to have merited even the slightest disapprobation from me? But I neglected, ruined, perhaps lisse and even criminal, my whole soul had gone out to her, and while I could not forgive, as I knew I could, she could suffer no harm. It resolved itself with a ready thought the plan I would pursue. I took her hand in mine again, and drew her closer to me.

"Mistress," I said, "you have done me no harm, and I could do you none, for I would not, nor dare not, do you one. You are safe with me. I contented. Don't tell me what you have done; I don't want to know it. Keep a drop over it, and never, even in your memory, dwell upon it. I will trust you, and do you trust me."

She was in earnest, with steady, unmoved eyes, she gazed into mine, which kindled not, and then, once more she nestled close down at my side like a scared bird that at length has found a secure retreat.

Poor and heart, she sinned against, I thought, and others sinned against her, and I was growing, and further cast out from the pale of the good.

She watched me as I fixed a bed for her, and thanked me with many expressions when I had completed it. I placed three or four of the softest mat bags in the passage-way of the car, near the forward door, and with a blanket and my pillow. I covered her with my blanket, and piled trunks all about her feet. She was hidden completely from view of a casual observer, the whole forward part of the car was a mass of trunks. Not even a prejudiced eye would have imagined that I had selected a resting place for a human in the forward door, and that a gentle creature was sleeping, what from its almost utter silence must be in a smoothed sleep.

Then I went slowly back to my box and revolved the matter in my mind.

In the darkness of the early morning it would be an easy matter to get her unseen from my car to the outer door, once on the bank of the river, where my little colored boy always awaited me with a hot cup of coffee and a warm bedroom. She could remain concealed there, and I bright day the garden would bloom with a new radiance for me, as day by day the beautiful lady, casting off her wretchedness as a garment, grew more and better. And together we would tread, humble and quiet, the reward paths of peace and goodness and I would be rewarded for my sins in the Eternal for which she seemed so much to long. Perhaps my selfishness was too largely in the accordant, but I thought of no other way even remotely open for her regeneration. There was for me in those of sickness, the soft hand and tender care, as time for me in the bright smile and cheerful welcome, that spoke of gratitude and happiness, for my old age, and I thought examples, patient advice, and for all times a sweet presence that would be as grateful as the perfume of roses. I did not contemplate the overwhelming influence that close would bring her from her elevated position down to my hard level. If I had reflected for a moment on that fact, I should human nature, its natural and repentant amidst circumstances which, in comparison, may be degrading, and which are forced upon it by the hands, how weak our love would have at once seemed all of my imaginings.

I went and looked over my barricade of trunks at her. She was in the slight dreamy state that is up her pale face, on which even in her sleep there seemed to be resting an expression that moved me to pity. Her dark hair and fallen locks, and in tangled masses fell over the head and was above her head, and trailed on the floor beyond. Her clenched, beautiful profile, was like the face of an angel seen in the midst of dark clouds.

I had been looking on her a few moments, when the numerous trunks and bags about me just then, for I heard the rear door open and shut, and looking over my shoulder, saw Old, the conductor, come into my car, put his lantern on the floor and sent himself on my box. It was an unusual time for him to come to my car so early in my car, especially at that hour of the night. He rubbed his hands one over the other for awhile, looking at the fire that was with a hearty, cosy air at my stove.

"Pre-ra-ther!" he cried, at length, looking up towards me, "but it's a cold night, Jake."

I knew that he was not thinking of the cold, although the bitter air seemed to make of the steam that rushed through the crevices of the door, a beswork of frost without any intermediate stage of water. And when I assented to his proposition he heard me not, for he had rapidly gone into a brown study again.

When a sufficiently long time had elapsed to give color to my being engaged only in properly fixing the baggage, I came and sat down by his side, but was very first exclamation alarmed me.

"Her name is the same as yours," was what he said, turning to me from his meditations, and bringing his hand roughly down on my knee. I can tell you that I looked suddenly around at the trunks that hid my uninvited but not unwelcome guest. O'Neil noticed my quick movement, and afterwards remembered it, but at the time it passed off for an appearance of anxiety lest the baggage should be tumbling down, or at least a resentment for being so sharply struck on the knee.

"It's almighty queer," he continued. "And I'll be darned if I know which is the most to blame."

A very mild way had O'Neil of using expletives.

"What do you mean?" I asked.

"You don't know what the white-haired old chap and the officer came on the train for, and are now on the train for?" he asked, answering.

"I am as innocent as a baby," I said, nervously.

"They are looking for a woman. Well a great many men are looking for women—that's so—but precious few are looking for them the way they look—or such a woman either, I guess. She's one of the devil's sisters, I think. And why? Because she has been around seeking whom she might destroy."

"In what way?" I asked.

"Well, in a good many. But what was strange to me, and that is what I was meditating upon, was whether she was a relative of yours. Her maiden name was Cockroft, so is yours, old fellow. But she's another breed of dogs entirely, for you are as mild and gentle as watered whiskey. But you need not take on in that manner, for I did not intend to insult you by connecting you with such a thing!"

I had arisen from my seat, and was walking up and down the car to conceal my agitation.

"Thing!" I repeated after him. "What are you talking about, O'Neil?"

"Ha, ha!" he laughed. "I guess the old man wants his sleep. He's as cross as a dog fed on fresh meat. Look here. That bright-eyed chap in back there, is a mighty fine talker, and claims that duty or no duty, he always goes provided with some prime cigars and a shooting instrument, that invariably hits a man straight in the mouth. Let's have him in here, get him uncorked, and listen to some of his experience."

"I want to sleep," I objected.

"Pshaw!" he exclaimed, "keep awake once, it won't hurt you, and perhaps he'll let on about your unfortunate namesake."

That was what I most especially desired to hear, but not in that place.

"I don't want him or any one else in my car, but I believe I will go back and listen to him," I said, after a moment.

Though the cigars and the shooting instrument were what would be particularly delightful to O'Neil, yet, as I was monarch of that territory, he knew that it would be useless to attempt to bring any one there without my consent. I followed him out, and very carefully locked the door behind me. For some trifling excuse, however, I returned and looked once more at my unconscious charge sleeping peacefully behind the barricade. With her pale face upturned, as if watching the recording of the vow I made, I determined that whatever it was that I should hear, unless of a fearfully criminal character, and that, I thought, I never should hear, something that was stamped with something besides mere social disgrace, I would protect and hide her from all pursuers.

There was one from whom I could not hide her.

When I found O'Neil again, he was standing in one of the coaches beside an empty seat.

Behind it sat the old gentleman, bolt upright and motionless, but his eyes wandered anxiously and restlessly about the car.

He was much disturbed, when he caught sight of me, which was probably increased by my own ill-concealed agitation, for although he did not stir, his face flushed, and his lips quivered.

O'Neil and myself sat down on the empty seat before him, opposite the officer, who slightly nodded to both of us.

The conductor said, in a very low tone:

"This is Cockroft."

But, low as it was, the old gentleman behind us, caught the sound of the name, and for a moment leaned over towards us.

"Ah, ha!" said the officer, looking at me for a moment, very intently, biting his words off short and speaking very sharp and quick, "Ah, ha! But not at all like her. Eh, O'Neil?"

O'Neil shook his head approvingly.

"Did you ever see her?"

I nodded.

"Where?"

In reply to which, I told him what had happened when I had first seen her.

"That's her," he exclaimed, eagerly, "all over. She is a gay, giddy girl! Always has been. Such are the kind that make all the misery there is in this little world. Because they cannot have things according to their own imperial likings or dislikings. I have watched these things repeatedly. They always run in the same line, you may depend. In grooves like——"

"What did she do subsequently?" I interrupted, impatiently. For if a man is tiresome and tedious, it is on a system of common philosophy, that he thinks he has discovered in the course of his own profession, and I was fairly aching to know her subsequent history. The impetuous Blue Coat having long possessed that power over his fellow-man with which the law clothed him, was somewhat egotistical, as such men are apt to become. He stopped very suddenly, rolled his eyes around at me at the interruption, and became silent.

"Because I may in one event—I may, I say," which I emphasized, "be able to help you somewhat."

"One event!" he exclaimed, turning suddenly towards me, "One event! What can that be? Soap? Do you know what an accessory is, sir? and that he can exist after as well as before a crime, sir?"

He said this harshly and sharply, in the same manner that I have heard judges on the bench address themselves to witnesses. But it did not intimidate me, nor disturb my calmness, under which, however, still burned that eagerness to know the subsequent history of the beautiful lady.

Crime? I thought. What would he give, did he know, that bounding along only a few feet ahead of him, was she whom he had just intimated was guilty of a crime? I don't know, however, that I felt any self-importance in being more knowing than this sharp officer of the law, whose success in his peculiar business had made him somewhat famous about the country.

"Ho, ho!" I laughed, with an effort, endeavoring to drive away his seeming displeasure. "I never yet, that I know of, did anything in my life that I knew to be wrong. I don't think I could do so now."

He looked at me as if he was puzzled, as if he was trying to read an enigma that I had given him. But O'Neil nodded approvingly, exclaimed:

"That's so, old Veracity."

And I continued:

"I said that I might help you somewhat, as one honest man might easily say to another. But likely my curiosity to know what became of one, who, with me had so narrowly escaped death, and whom I"—I hesitated, for I came near saying whom I had never seen since, but changed into—"whom I would earnestly like to see again, in all her young, magnificent beauty, as she was then, gave a stronger turn to my remark than it deserved, or than I meant."

"Look here," he said, after he had stared me full in the face for a whole minute, "look at that old man there, with his head bared and bowed as for a blow. He is bent down with sorrow. He has lost everything that is dear to him. And his life, which used to be as pleasant as a summer dream, and as precious as a good man's hope of heaven, has become useless to him now. He would give it up gladly. She, your namesake, is the immediate cause of all of this. He has told me repeatedly that he felt her presence on this train. He believes that he will meet her before it is morning. We have been through the train at every station. At the next, to satisfy him, and myself too, I shall go from engine to the bumper of the last coach—and send him back home on the up train. But I will never cease until I find her."

"She must be guilty of something more than infidelity to her husband," I half asked, half suggested, "that should cause so much of a charge."

"Husband!" he exclaimed. "Well, here. Give me your hand. You're a fair spoken fellow—and an honest. I thought you one of those sharp rogues that know more than they dare tell. It isn't perhaps quite right to be always on the alert. But don't you know that it isn't quite fair to cut a fellow's belly-band when he has mounted his hobby, especially if you want to learn anything from him."

Then he stopped short and folded his arms.

"Well," I said, after a pause, and taking a look at my watch, "It's nearly an hour to the next station. Will you tell me that which you know I am burning to hear?

He just smiled a little, as if complimented by the earnest tone in which I had spoken, leaned forwards towards me, and in a voice, like a whisper, so as not to attract the attention of the old man behind us, but in a [illegible] tone that made it as impressive as the service for the dea[illegible] he told me what seemed more like a nightmare than a rea[illegible]

"It makes me hate beautiful women," he said; "or rather dread them. I feel now, when I see one, like this. Keep away from it. It's a leopard asleep—graceful and lovely in repose. The soft feet, like velvet, seem made to tread only on moss. The gentle mouth only to lap up milk. But aroused, out comes the claws and the sharp teeth! How they will tear and rave and gnaw at the vitals of that which thwarts them; and more dreadful, because unexpected; more horrible, because it is hard to couple beauty with such ferocity. But no matter. Short and quick is the word. Listen.

"Perhaps I take more interest in the case because Milton Haylwood was an old school-mate of mine. The old gentleman's name is not Haylwood. It is Weyant, Michael Weyant. Haylwood was always what we used to call sweet on Gertie Cockroft, which was her name. A little too much fond a sensible one would have said too—as I did. I have, many a time, long ago—never lately, rallied him on the matter, but got a sharp answer or a cuffed ear for my pains—and she was such an unconscionable tyrant to him. He, the quietest, most patient subject, as if he delighted in being tyranized over. Strange, too, for he was high-blooded, mettlesome enough elsewhere. Sometimes he made me think of a high-spirited horse, held down by a snaffle bit and a tight rein. He'll champ, and paw, and fret, and worry, but the bit and the rein conquer him at length. It is as children that I am speaking of them now, too. I have known her to throw her cap into the river just to see him swim after it and bring it back to her. While we fellows on the bank only dared to laugh amongst ourselves, and call him "Gerty's pup" on the sly, lest he punish us. For he could master us all, I believe. I have known him to whip soundly the best friend he had in school because Gertie told him to, out of pure mischief. And I have seen him stand up, unflinchingly, and be punished by the master, most severely punished, in the face of the whole school, for mischief which Gertie had done, of which he was ignorant, but which she said was Milton's fault! I could not and cannot account for the control that she had over him. I know it was not with the feeling on his part, that at some time or other the tables would be turned, and he be the tyrant. He was too young to understand that masculine philosophy. Nor was it the effect of his great love for her. For many a thing he did, which, had it been only love, his great pride would have kept him from doing. Though that there was strong, deep, abiding love between them, pure love, that was knit into their being from their earliest childhood, they afterwards fully proved to me, though in an awful manner.

"Of course, everybody laid out the future lives of these two children. They were to be man and wife. Or, as there was every indication of it, woman and husband. Alas! for the good of the world, that there should be as many as there are.

"The reality didn't follow as closely and smoothly on the heels of the prophesy, as the unanimity of the prophets might lead one to expect. There was evidently a whole hatch of false prophets. A hitch occurred in the plan proposed by disinterested friends, when Gertie became of a marriageable age. The thing wouldn't work. Gertie's uncle interfered, somewhat to the discomfiture of all concerned. He decreed, autocratically, that she must marry his old friend, Weyant, who had an eye for youth and beauty, and when he said must, it meant that it was already done.

"Of course we can't tell now, and I don't care to know, what means the old obstinate took to bring about such a result. I am sure I don't know how I should go to work to do it. But done it was, and Squire Haylwood was left out in the cold.

"This seems to me the most singular thing of all. For Gertie loved Milton with all of that force of which such a hot-blooded, desperate-headed creature as she is, is capable. And when such a woman loves! Well, it is unnecessary to talk of the noon-day sun in the tropics, or the Desert of Sahara. I know that I thought of runaway matches, elopements, and such old-fashioned ways as the termination of her uncle's plans. But the wild, barum-scarum girl disappointed us all. She was very quietly married; went away. It was then that you saw her—came back, and seemed to settle down to a tame, wifely woman."

THE LELAND OPERA HOUSE,

At Saratoga Springs.

Is located within the delightful grove of elms, on the Union Hotel grounds, the front facing the hotel, with the rear on Federal street. Its dimensions are 125 feet in length by 65 in breadth; height from first tier of boxes to ceiling, 36 feet. The whole building is surrounded by two piazzas 20 feet broad, each piazza corresponding with the tiers, and forming lobbies and standing room for spectators and promenaders. The piazzas open to the tiers by some 30 large glass doors, which can be thrown open at any time for purposes of ventilation or ingress and egress. The piazzas are supported by 60 columns, artistically fashioned upon the Corinthian order. The whole edifice is elevated six feet from the surface of the ground, for the purpose of giving stage room and depth of parquette, which is seven feet below the sills, where the parquette joins the orchestra. The whole of the space under the piazzas and auditorium is devoted to two apartments, one of which is used as a ladies' and the other as a gentlemen's billiard-saloon. There is room for six tables in the gentlemen's part, and for four in that of the ladies'. Both these apartments are elegantly carpeted, and furnished with cushioned chairs and settees. These saloons are nine feet high in the clear. In the day time they are lighted by large side windows, and in the evening by gas.

The main entrance of the house is approached by a flight of nine steps, 30 feet in length, with handsome architectural ornaments on each side, surmounted by a number of brilliant gas lights. The main entrance to the body of the house is through three spacious arched doors, on either side of which are broad stairs leading to the second circle.

The auditorium is 75 feet deep by 65 broad, capable of comfortably seating in both circles and parquette 1,400 people. The seats are oak cane-seat chairs, and each arranged so that the occupant has plenty of room and a good view of the stage. The chairs form half a true circle, with the lines carefully converging to the [illegible]ium boxes. [illegible] the circles are richly painted in white [illegible] with appropriate devices in gold. prosce[illegible] The panels [illegible] by 12 iron columns, and pearl, ornamented [illegible] painted white and The second circle is suppo[illegible] six in front and six in the rear, p[illegible] gilded.

The side walls are chastely colored white and pearl, similar to the panellings of the circles. The ceiling is arched to the centre from all sides, converging to the top of the proscenium, which is arranged with pilasters and columns on each side of the stage, leaving an opening 36 feet broad and 36 feet high for stage business. On each side of this are a number of large and comfortable private boxes, elegantly fitted up with damask curtains. The entire auditorium is illuminated by side gas brackets and chandeliers of bronze and gilt. The auditorium is ventilated from the top by spacious openings leading up directly from the roof partially concealed by the ornamental work of the ceiling. By this arrangement, in addition to the doors opening from the piazzas, a constant circulation of pure air is secured, rendering the place in the most sultry weather at once cool and comfortable.

The orchestra is enclosed by a railing, and is eight feet deep by thirty-six feet wide, capable of accommodating the largest of opera orchestras. The footlights extend the whole width of the stage, and are so sunk in the floor as not to be seen from the front, but at the same time throwing a very powerful light upon the stage.

The stage is fifty feet deep and sixty-five feet broad. On each side is apportioned the usual space for scenery. At this part of the building the piazzas are enclosed, giving ample room for green-room, dressing-rooms, property rooms etc., on the first floor and basement. Under the stage a clear space is left for the operations of stage machinery.

The scenery and properties are all entirely new, and very extensive, sufficient for all operatic and dramatic performances.

The drop curtain represents a view through an open arch, supported by columns that belong to a gallery or extension back of the proscenium, in a serene Grecian landscape. In the middle ground of the landscape passes the festive procession of Muses moving, with Apollo in their midst, towards a temple seen in the distance. A rich uplifted drapery nearly surrounds the main scene, and represents the appearance of a gorgeous framework to a splendid picture. It is altogether a charming painting, and was executed by Mr. Henry Youngling, of New York, who has also had charge of the painting of the scenery, as well as the fresco work in the body of the house.

The outside ornaments of the edifice are in the highest degree classical and artistic; and with a large gilded American eagle, and the American colors flying from elevated flagstaffs, adds a national as well as a truly attractive feature to the whole structure. The architect of this gem of an Opera House, this temple of music and beauty, this centre of attraction for fashion and grace the coming season, is Mr. William T. Beer, of this city. The builder is Mr. John Benedict, of Saratoga. The masonry was executed by Mr. Seymour Ainsworth, also of Saratoga. The gas fittings and fixtures were prepared by George H. Kitchen & Co., of New York.

The cost of the structure complete was $60,000, exclusive of the land. The building has been leased to Mr. Leonard Grover, the well-known operatic and dramatic manager, which is a guarantee that the performances will be of a character commensurate with the elegance of the entire establishment. Two nights have been reserved by the Messrs. Leland for the purpose of giving a grand opening ball, and for closing the season with a grand fancy dress ball and masquerade.

TOWN GOSSIP.

The Park is in full dress and receiving visitors. It is the only Boccaccio Garden in America. It is Italy imprisoned. There are the lakes, bright and silent, with sailing swans and flecks of graceful boats. There are groves, and tangled walks, bridges, vistas—the whole repertory of landscape gardening. High in air is the hanging sea, the Reservoir, a laver of stainless crystal that melts away in the warm bright atmosphere. But to describe the garden one needs to be Boccaccio, and the story would fill out the books of the Decameron.

The city mouse, bound to show to the country mouse the richness and extent of the cheese in which he burrows, will naturally choose the Fifth avenue approach to the Park. How the little rustic's heart quakes as he steals up between those high, frigid, unfriendly walls! There is nothing that makes a stranger feel more strange and farther from home, Jemima, and the amenities, than these gloomy cañons, where the rock, fretted into stairways and portals for conquerors to pass, rushes up to the sky on either side. And his extermination is complete, if, perchance, at some loop-hole where cascades of lace are trickling, the New York girl, in all the terrors of style and innate snobbishness looks him into the ground.

Then there is the flunkey. He goes to the Park clinging like a gilded fly as he rolls behind the children of petroleum. He feels his calves quiver, and would be willing to exhibit them. He is solemn, superb and vain. But he is unappreciated, and he is unhappy. He feels like an exotic, and pines among his halls and towers. The hardy indigenous plants of American institutions spring up and choke him. May he continue to pine and to be sprung upon and choked to all eternity!

There is one class of public servants who are giving great dissatisfaction, and who must be trembling in their shoes lest an indignant city should oust them entirely. These are the postmen. The papers are publishing complaining and almost tearful letters. Frederick, whose daily billets to Robertine, are a matter of ardent necessity to him, and of many meaning winks to the carrier whom he is abusing, finds that those tender lines to his mistress' Grecian curls did not reach their destination for two days, so he tunefully ventilates his complaint (dexterously disguising it—the deep fellow—with a story about a legal appointment with Judge Brady) in the columns of the Blason. It is certainly sad. We took his wrongs deeply to heart—it was about the time of the great tornado, in which we journeyed from near the Park to Courtlandt street to meet our wife's aunt, whose letter of regrets had unfortunately been delayed—and turning it over in our stupid head could hit upon no brighter way of avenging society than to "lick" or chastise the various postmen as we might meet them at dark corners in detail. But coming upon one when every opportunity was favorable, and getting near with a wicked feeling in our boot, we were brought to a stop by the look of the man—little and heavy-headed, the low cores of the mouth drawing down its corners, and the weary grasp of a huge span of papers in a hand made extra large for the business. We disdained to hurt such a poor representative of tyranny, and so the public wrong is unavenged.

The discharged military have been in a state of great agitation about the Sonora expedition. We heard of it through a warrior, a friend of ours, who deserves well of his country, having defended with incredible valor the post of secretary in the commissariat department, down in South Carolina. He was full of enthusiasm. He proposed to get a pecuniary inducement in the shape of a sum of money, variously stated at from forty-five to eight thousand dollars, notes for the payment of which had already been printed from the neat plates discovered in the vaults of the Charleston Bank. In addition, there was a grant of eight hundred acres of gold mine, eligibly situated on the cool side of the moon. He had neither the money nor the patent about him, unfortunately, for we wished to inspect them; but apologised for their absence by the statement that Gen. Ortega had gone to Washington, and that Col. Allen was so pestered with demands for vouchers and a definite explanation of his scheme, that he had unhappily lost his patience, and revenged himself by referring all inquirers to the public prints for information. The pavement all around Howard and Crosby streets, our friend declared, was strewn with countless fragments of Heralds, Tribunes, Worlds and other dailies, viciously torn across and trampled by goaded querists. He left us to seek a personal interview, having a letter of introduction from one of Barnum's giants, who speaks Spanish. He was sanguine of suc[illegible] but we have not seen him since.

On Tu[illegible]day night week we obtained, by means of [illegible]mmering with the Peruvian Consul, a [illegible] Hon. E. G. Squier, late Commissioner to that country, where [illegible] some ingenious [illegible] meeting of the Ethnological Society was transpiring. pass into the residence o[illegible] Of course we [illegible] Now, [illegible] know well what ethnology is; it is disagreeable [illegible] pressed, but we do not, in this instance, mind unearthing our firm conviction that it is a science of a culinary nature, with bearings upon the cookery of the ancient Britons, and the Etrurian method of introducing the apple into the dumpling. Among the curiosities displayed by Mr. Squier as the result of his researches into the ethnology of the ancient Peruvians, we observed specimens of maize, with grains larger than a horse's teeth (from which we inferred that popping corn was doubtless a favorite and exciting amusement among the Incas), also an endless variety of flasks, pocket-pistols, carafes, decanters, etc.—all unfortunately empty—and rollingpins made of a stone whose crystal and fracture resembled hard tack. There were also quantities of Peruvian skulls, likewise empty—one had actually been trepanned, probably the Inca method of getting an idea in, but that skull was as empty as the rest. The point of interest in these heads of a highly ingenious people seemed to us to be that they manufactured their own phrenology, trimming the skull into favorite bumps while the bones were young and pliable. Some tribes exhibited these skulls neatly dressed—possibly with the rolling-pins—into the figure of an elongated noodle, such as dodge the ladle in a tureen; while the true Inca heads appeared to have been much sat upon by the mothers in early youth, giving fine lateral development to the temporal regions. Mr. Squier made use of these relics to illustrate a learned and delightful narrative, of which we distinctly remember the peroration. It was "Come into the dining-room!" and if we were better arithmeticians we would tell you what two waiters divided into forty ethnologists, and what was to carry.

We omitted an important item in our little notice of the National Academy last week. We mean the sculpture of the American Republic, whose sculptors are famous the world over. We take an early opportunity for the amende, and devote the conclusion of this twaddle to the triumphs of the American chisel during the past year. There are no such triumphs of the American chisel on exhibition, and now our story is done. Remember the liveliest chapter in old Von Tromp's History of Iceland: "Chapter VI, the Snakes of Iceland. In Iceland there are no snakes of any description."

There is, however, a model of Bryant's head, by Launt Thompson, which is good. It is noble, expressive, the very ideal of a bard, and, in fine, adequate to its intended position in the Park—with which good word, excellent for head-piece or tail-piece, we begin and end this park-ling chapter, and rest on our nibs for another week.

AUTHOR OF "LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET," ETC., ETC.

"You never told me—"

"No—I told you I had been a private in the Staff. The other business was only a part my duty."

Maude was silent for some moments after this. She sat looking steadily out of the window, while Francis still trusted the Berlin wools in his strong fingers. Maude was the first to speak.

"Was it Mr. Lowther you meant just now, when you spoke of a discontented fine gentleman?" she asked, with some slight hesitation.

"Yes; I never served any other master. Ensign Lowther was horribly discontented. He was one of those men who can't take things easily; but I can understand a good deal of his peevish restlessness now. I can sympathise with him now, Maude."

His voice grew low and tender as he said this.

"Why?" asked Miss Hillary, rather coldly.

"He was in love, Maude—an unhappy attachment, as I understand, to some lady—an heiress, I think—whose money was a hindrance to a marriage between them."

From the beginning to the end of this conversation Maude Hillary's thoughts had been employed in debating one question—should she, or should she not, tell her future husband that Hascomb Lowther was the man to whom she had been previously engaged? He knew of that broken engagement, but he did not know the name of her lover. Was it her duty to tell him? It would be very unpleasant to do so; but then duty is so often unpleasant. She was still silently debating this subject; the weight of which she should speak were forming themselves in her mind; when the drawing-room door was opened, and a servant announced Mr. Lowther. Maude's heart beat violently. Would there be a scene? Why had Hascomb come, when he knew that Mr. Lowther very especially relieved her fears upon this subject. Nothing could be more delightful than his manners. He was cordial to his old servant, without attempting any airs of patronage. He could not have been more entirely at his ease with Maude, had he been the most indifferent of first cousins.

Mr. Lowther was only acting up to his determination to take things easily. He had met Maude Hillary in the city that morning, and had surprised the young lady by speaking of Maude's engagement to Francis Tredethlyn.

"But don't alarm yourself, my dear Hillary," he said, with a frank smile. "I'm not going to indorse, and do adore your daughter, in only to admit a fact to which, I daresay, every male visitor at Sandhurst would be happy to subscribe with round-robin. Miss Hillary is made to be worshipped. I have only been one among a score of worshippers; and I would be happy to renew my very natural prejudice against my disgusting perfection. I have long ceased to hope it, as it was scarcely such a worthy love to be returned as it had happened during my exile. Will you let me renew my old relations with your household? Will you let me be one of the male angels? I know now that the candle will burn, and that its dangerous glare alone, and not its tender warmth, is received for me, so I shall have my wits about me. I shall be a comparatively safe visitor."

Mr. Hillary did reply to this rather sentimental speech was a hearty invitation to dinner.

"I can give you your favorite Rhenish-cheimer with the cygnets. Dinner is at six, which you can get good luck. Sharp seven, remember; but you may go earlier if you care for croquet. I daresay you'll find Tredethlyn there."

"The poor fellow is very hard hit, I say one!" Mr. Hillary smiled, and shrugged his shoulders, "I never saw such a devoted creature. Good day."

The merchant hurried off, and Harcourt walked slowly away, pondering as he went.

"A devoted creature. Yes, and there has been new blood let into the commercial anatomy of Hillary & Co. since the day the poor devil, Tredethlyn, has been laid to a lifeless extent."

The dinner at the Cedars went off very pleasantly. What dinner could fail to go off pleasantly well, enlivened by Harcourt Lowther, when that gentleman cared to exercise his genius for making conversation? There were other guests at the merchant's round table, and after dinner people showed a disposition to stroll out of the dining-room drawing-room on to the dusky lawn, and down to the terrace, drawn perhaps by the magnetic influence of the moon, which will be looked at.

It happened somehow—I suppose Mr. Lowther himself managed it—that he and Maude were left a little way behind the rest of the hilarious party she fondly terrace. All her vividly in the memory of both was the picture of a time long ago, when they had stood there side by side, by the same river, in a twilight calm like this, with the same star glittering steadily in a pure cloudless western sky. In Maude's breast that moment awakened cruel pangs of shame and remorse. In Harcourt Lowther's breast there was a slightly mingled feeling of bitterness and regret—bitterness against the Destiny which had given him so few of life's probable possessions, regret for the vanished time in which some natural carelessness, some touch of fresh and manly feeling, had yet lingered in his heart.

"Poor, simple, unworldly Maude," he thought, as he contemplated the girl's pale face, "what a penitent look she had and yet if she knew—"

He smiled, and left the thought unfinished. Then, turning to Maude, he said with a little touch of melancholy solemnity, worthy of Edgar Ravenswood himself,

"Miss Hillary, let us be friends. If you can bury the past, so can I. We may yet grow sweet flowers of friendship on the grave of our dead love."

"And I really don't want to let Francis Tredethlyn slip through my fingers altogether," Mr. Lowther added mentally, as a sort of order to that pesky little speech.

Maude looked at him with rather a puzzled expression.

"You are very generous," she faltered, embarrassed, and at a loss how to express herself, "but —don't you think it would be better for us—to say good-bye to each other—for ever? I—I hope you will marry some one—worthy of you—some one who is less the slave of circumstance than I am. I want to do my duty to Mr. Tredethlyn—and I think it is a part of my duty to tell him of our broken engagement."

"My dear Miss Hillary, you would surely never do anything so foolish. Poor Francis is the best fellow in the world, but he is just the man to be ferociously jealous if he once got any foolish scruple into his head. I have lived in the same house with him, remember, and must therefore know him better than you do. As for saying farewell for ever, and all that kind of thing, your eternal parting reads remarkably well in a novel, but it isn't practicable between civilised people who belong to the same set society. Georgina hits Algeron an irrevocable adieu on Thursday morning, and there is a burning of letters and knocking to Brompton Cemetery; and on Saturday evening the same Algernon takes her down to dinner in Westbourne Terrace. We can bury the past as a deep a grave as we please, but we shall be ghosts of memory with any exorcism you please, and we can't pledge ourselves not to meet any day we like to walk in the houses of our common friends."

Maude was quite unable to frame with so specious a reasoner as Mr. Lowther. She did her best to defend her position, and urged the necessity of telling Francis Tredethlyn of the whole truth. But Harcourt overruled her objections, and when he obtained from her a promise that she would still remain silent as to the name of her discarded lover.

CHAPTER XXIII.—HINTS OF SUSAN.

ASSORBED in the conflicting tortures and delights of his bondage, Francis Tredethlyn had thought very little of that mysterious visitor who had once been so near and dear to him. Now and then, indeed, he had been most entirely under the spell of Maude Hillary's fascinations, and had thought of a rosy rustic face, framed in a little dimity bonnet, had suddenly forced before him, with a reproachful or his forgetfulness and neglect, and he had resolved that on the very next day some one should be dispatched in search for Susan Tredethlyn. But then, on that next day, Francis generally some flower-show or matinee musicale, or some hostess at Fulham or Putney to play croquet at Twickenham, in short, some other pretty other for devoting himself to Maude Hillary, and her pretty image would be driven from his mind. But Mr. Tredethlyn was suddenly startled into recollection of his neglected duty by the receipt of a letter from Susan soliciting, with many blots and misspellings, an early interview, and announcing that she had an important communication to make respecting Miss Susan Tredethlyn, otherwise Miss Susan Turner.

The letter was a communication. The gentleman felt his face grow hot as he read the letter. Susan was found, perhaps, he thought. He had never mentioned Susan to Maude Hillary, and now it might be that she would need all the discretion of a loving protector, perhaps even the strong arm of an avenger, to do it. Such a contingency thought was absorbed by his approaching marriage. The young man did not wait for any ceremonious appointment, but hurried off to see Mr. Kurzdale, and presented himself before Mr. Kurzdale, the senior partner.

In the outer office Francis Tredethlyn's hot eagerness tamed down a little before the matter-of-fact manner of the solicitor. There was a sober tranquility in the aspect of the room in which he was placed, which seemed to have a singularly soothing effect upon all those who entered it. The busy little clerks ticking on the gray stone mantelpiece, a skeleton clock, exhibiting its entire anatomy to the public eye, and superior to all human curiosity or amusement, seemed perpetually ticking out in the stillness:

"Let me advise you to take it easily; let me recommend you to take it easily; let me advise you Law can do for you will be done for you here; but it must be done in the Lawe own way, which is slow, and very complicated, and rather injury to human patience."

Mr. Kurzdale received Francis with calm cordiality, and after a few unduly complimentary preceded at once to business.

"I need not remember that my opinion and that of my partner—for I never act in any matter of importance in the matter—you will, no doubt, recollect, was entirely opposed to the policy of the manuscript or journal which you confided to me, I came to the conclusion that the writer of that journal had been unconsciously imposing upon some considerable city by a mock marriage, a sham ceremonial, performed before some person falsely representing himself to be a district curate. That person was never really forced upon me by the wording of the diary. Look at the diary in what light I would, and I assure you I weighed the matter most carefully—I could not see my way to any other conclusion."

"I understand," answered Francis. "I knew the man was a scoundrel. I made that out somewhat clearly from the journal. I knew he meant mischief and treachery upon little Susy; but I couldn't make out what treachery till you opened my eyes to the truth."

"But suppose that, after all my care, I was too hasty in forming a conclusion. Suppose that we have been mistaken, Mr. Tredethlyn."

"How do you mean, sir?"

"Some days since, I happened to open a drawer which had been unopened for a long time, and hidden under a lot of other documents I found the diary which you entrusted to me. The sight of the manuscript reminded me of you and your missing cousin, so I suppose it was only natural that I should turn over the pages, not in the hope of finding any new meaning in them, however, for I had studied them too carefully for that. I turned them over, and while debating the question of a mock marriage the thought suddenly flashed upon me that it would be at least very easy to ascertain if any genuine ceremonial had taken place in London. Remember, Mr. Tredethlyn, I did not for one moment imagine that there had been a real marriage, and I fully believed that the trouble I was about to take would be a mere formality. I had not from the first been firmly convinced that the writer of the diary contemplated a sham marriage, and nothing but a sham marriage. Indeed, at the outset, have done that which I only did the next day."

Francis Tredethlyn's impatience was so very evident, that the lawyer, slow as he generally was, quickened his pace a little as he went on.

"I was determined to institute an investigation of the books of every registrar's office in the metropolis during the months of January, February, and March, 1849. I entrusted a confidential clerk with the task, and three days afterwards he brought me the result of his investigations. On the fifth of February, 1849, Robert Lesley was married to Susan Turner, in the office of the district registrar for Marylebone. The registrar's name was Joseph Pepper; the names of the witnesses to the marriage Jacob and Jemima Banks, of No. 7 Woolcote Villas, St. John's Wood."

"Thank God!" ejaculated Francis Tredethlyn, reverently, and then, after a pause, "my little Susan's safe, that this man was not the scoundrel to betray him, for—"

"My brother such a marriage, contracted under a false name on your cousin's part, and it is very possible, also under a false name on the part of the writer of the diary, that your cousin, Susan, might not be open to dispute, is another question. However, the ceremonial, as far as it went, was genuine, and I thought there would be some little difficulty in setting it aside."

"It shall be set aside!" cried Francis, "if Heave the power to enforce it. Thank God for this, Mr. Kurzdale, and thank you for the thought, and the tact same, that led to the discovery of the truth."

"You must remember, though, my dear Mr. Tredethlyn, that a marriage is a solemn thing, and almost alarmed by the young man's vehemence. "you must bear in mind that it is just possible that Susan Turner may have taken Robert Lesley and some other Robert Lesley married in the month of February, 1849, and that this registrar-ship may prove to be a blind."

"I am not afraid of that," Francis answered, decisively. "No, the man meant to be a scoundrel, I daresay; but he was Susan's husband, and therefore touched her heart at the very last, perhaps, and he could not be such a villain as to deceive her. Mr. Kurzdale, I thank you for the advice you have given me, and I shall live to thank you for it, and to divide my uncle Oliver's money with her."

Mr. Kurzdale stared at his client in blank astonishment.

"You would—do that?" he asked, after a pause.

"Of course I would. Poor little, ill-used darling! The money was hers, every penny of it, by right. I—I meant at first to have married it all after to buy, but now alters have arisen for me, and I can gladly give up half the fortune that should belong to her own."

The solicitor smiled a grave smile.

"And now how are we to find Susie?" asked Francis. "This registration business gives us a new clue, does it not?"

"Unquestionably. We can at any rate hope to find the two witnesses, Mary and Jemima Banks, and from them we may learn your cousin's present whereabouts. I'll send a clerk to those Banks people to-morrow."

"No, no, no; you shall! I'd rather go and look for them myself, and at once," and Francis. "I've been very neglectful of Susie's interests lately, and I want to do something by way of trying to make up for my neglect. I'll go myself, Mr. Kurzdale, and try to find out those people. If they live in London I shall find them. If not, I'll come here to-morrow morning and tell you the result."

The young man wrote the address of the people in St. John's Wood in his pocketbook, shook hands with the solicitor, and hurried away. He was so eager to atone for the neglect of the past by the activity of the present. He hailed a Hansom in the street, and was on his way to St. John's Wood five minutes after he left the lawyer's office. He sat with his watch open in his hand, and was very much astonished when at the time it would take him to find the females, Mary and Jemima Banks, extort from them all the information they had to give, drive back to his hotel, reorganise his toilet, and then make his way to Twickenham. Mr. Tredethlyn had some faint recollection of a lady of late, and employed a Wesleyan tailor, hababoned his honest face with a grizzly-backed brushes, and believed his cambric handkerchief with the odoriferous lotions of that necromancer of the flower garden, Jockey Club. Nevertheless, the big Cornishman smiled at his reflection in the glass somewhat wondering at his own frivolity. But it was for Maude Hillary's sake that he was thus lavishing exboriously every day, and grew critical in the choice of a waistcoat. He had even hired a man to wait upon him, and had a little regiment of boot-trees in his dressing-room.

St. John's Wood proper is perhaps one of the most delightful suburban retreats in which the man who, yearning for the waving of green trees about his shade, is yet obliged to live within an easy cab drive from the city, can make a pleasant temple for his tares and pastures. Dear little villas, embowered in foliage; stately mansions, towering prenily out of half an acre of trimly-kept garden, invite the wealthy citizen to retirement and repose. The young Blues and labyrinths of to-day may represent but poorly the honky ravines of the past, but still the Wood of St. John is a cool and pleasant oasis in the great desert of London.

But there are outskirts and dependencies of St. John that are not quite so pleasant—ragged wastes and shabby little boxes, that bring the tattered elves disgracing a nearby garment. These dismal streets and dreary terraces may not belong of right to St. John, but they hang about him, and cling to him, and shelter themselves under the grandeur of his name, nevertheless.

Woolcote Villas, St. John's Wood, were very pretentious little dwelling-places, fronted with damp stucco, and with a tendency to a mossy greenness of aspect that was remarkably depressing. Woolcote Villas were of the Elizabethan order of architecture, and went off abruptly into peaks and angles wherever a peak or an angle was possible. How small household deeds required the massive stacks of Elizabethan chimneys which made Woolcote Villas appear tophazy and ingenginers to the eye of the stranger, was an enigma not solved by the architect who adapted those habitations; and why Woolcote Villas should each be furnished off with a stanchel matted pot, popularly known as a Chinese Puzzle, which was not Elizabethan, and not practicable for habitation, luring upon the four winds of heaven, was another problem perpetually puzzling the same individual's solution.

Francis Tredethlyn, after driving through all the intricacies of St. John's Wood on different false scents, came at last upon Woolcote Villas, and found No. 7 at the end of a straight row, and pulled up his horse before the door of number six.

Francis alighted and rang the bell—a bell with a stark wire, which required to be pulled a great deal harder than any effect was produced. At last, however, the bell rang, and then, after a pause and another peal, the door was up and, and a slatternly servant girl, with a flapping crake of dirty cat hanging from the back of her untidy head, emerged from number seven. Woolcote Villas, be it remembered, was at the back gate before which Francis Tredethlyn was waiting.

The young man asked if Mrs. Banks was at home, and was told that she was, and Francis also. Did he please to want the apartments?

Mr. Tredethlyn told her that he had particular business with Mrs. Banks, and that if she was at home he wished to see. The girl looked disappointed, and there were a good many bills in the Elizabethan windows of Woolcote Villas, up the demands of lodgers were not equal to the supply of London apartments.

The sound of a thrilling piano, played very badly, greeted Mr. Tredethlyn as he entered the passage of No. 7. The door of the parlor was opened the door of the apartment whence the sound came, and Francis found himself in a shabby parlor, occupied by a young lady and gentleman. The piano he entered, and who was very fine and yet very shabby, and a trifle dirty, like the parlor, and the house in Woolcote Villas generally. The lady were a greasy-looking black silk, relieved by a cooquettish little apron of Smart plaid, and ornamented with a profusion of cheap jewelry and velvets, with a good deal of mosaic jewellery in the way of chains and crosses, and anchors and lockets, and had her hair in very much frizzled head-dress, and dowed in general ringlets of the corkscrew order, which were already shoddies. She was altogether a very extensively adorned young lady; and she gave a little start expressive of surprise when Francis came in. But a slight admixture of pleasure, as Mr. Tredethlyn presently perceived before her. Many single gentlemen had inspected the apartments in Woolcote Villas, but here was at one among them so good-looking, or so splendid of aspect, as this tall, broad-shouldered Cornishman, who moved and corrected by his West-end tailor.

The gentleman, I suppose," the young lady said, curtsying and simpering, "has come for a long hour, perhaps you will allow me to show them to the parlor. It is the parlor. If the one-a sitting-room only is required, with a bedroom. Including dinner on Sundays, the terms would be a trifle more than the parlor. The apartments, without board, fifteen shillings, or with board—"

The young lady would have proceeded further, but Francis Tredethlyn interrupted her.

"I beg your pardon," he said, "I don't require apartments; my business is with Mrs. Banks, if I rightly understand that is the elderly lady who—"

"Mary—or Jemima—Banks?" asked Francis.

"Miss Mary Jemima Banks," the young lady replied, with considerable dignity. "Did you think the good-looking stranger inclined to be familiar with the servant girl? I am not to be proceeded to be aware of the intended report."

"I am very glad that I have been so fortunate as to find you," he said. "Can you tell me or give me the information I want. You were present at a marriage before the registrar, at an office in Fulham-row, Hamphrow, on the 5th of February, 1849. Can you tell me where the bride and bridegroom lived? Their names, I think, comprised out of her statelinen. "Poor Susan was your cousin, was she? Way, she came home from a fortnight's honeymoon!"

"She came here?"

"Yes; she was lodging here before that, and she and her husband went off to Paris after the ceremony, and there was no breakfast and no nothing; and Mr. Lesley, he was always very high and mighty-like in his ways, he flung down a twenty-pound note upon the desk before the registrar, and when the man said something about change, he threw on his head scornfully—a-la was a way he had if anything vexed him—"There's your money,' he said, 'and don't let's have any humbug,' and then he dropped his poor little wife's hand through his arm, just nodded to me and mother, and walked off to the establishment at the corner, not as a member in the registrar's office. The registrar was full of praises of the gentlemanly generosity, and said he'd like to tip half-a-dozen such couples every week, but mother was regularly cross about that twenty-pound note, and went on about it all the way home, saying that Mr. Lesley had grunted her down cheap enough about the routine these rooms, and a deal too much owing off his genuinely extravagant relations."

"And no cousin Susan went to Paris?"

"Yes, but only for a fortnight, and we was to keep the apartments for her, which we did, and at the end of a fortnight she came back, dressed beautiful, and with all sorts of lovely things in her boxes, and she was humble as well and so happy, and anybody would have thought she was the happiest woman in the world. But, mother, she used to shake her head short it, and say she never knew these secret sort of marriages to come to any good, because, when a gentleman begins by not wanting to own his wife, he's very apt to end by wishing he hadn't married her; but mother always looks at the black side of things, whether it's cases or whether it's history, or whatever it is, and don't take much notice. Mrs. Lesley seemed very happy, and Mr. Lesley, for the first week or so, he stopped at home a good deal, and scarcely ever went out, except to take his wife out to dine, or to a theatre, or something of that sort, and they really seemed the happiest couple that ever was; but by-and-bye Mr. Lesley went away; to college, he with told me; and I shall never know who picked out that thing, the night he left her, or how closely she looked sitting in this room, where they'd been so happy together, and then their little quiet supper after the theatre, and everything that heart could wish. She'd got some books that he'd left behind him evening before he left the table, and she was turning one of them over when I went in to see her.

"Maybe very hard to understand, Miss Burke,' she said, 'but I try to read them, because I want to be clever, and able to talk to Robert when he comes home.'

"After this she was almost always reading, poor little thing, and she'd sit in this room for hours and days together; for she didn't like to go out alone, and mother does drive and worry so, that it wasn't much good out with her. Mr. Lesley was to be away three months, she told me; and I'm sure that poor thing used to count the hours, and minutes almost, waiting for time to go; but when the three months was up, there was no Mr. Lesley; he was going sailing somewhere in Wales with some grand friends, she told me, and wouldn't be home till the next vacation. I never saw any one so cut up as she was by the disappointment, though she couldn't ask short it, only I could see every morning by her face, that she'd been lying awake half the night, crying her poor eyes out.

"Poor girl, poor girl!" murmured Francis Trodethyn.

LOVE.

THE gay young earth,
World of the sun, would break its heart with joy,
But that its joy doth rest itself in flowers.
So when young Love holds in a maiden's heart,
And builds a bower for his nest, and waves his hood
Of twittering loves as did a magi mages,
Thereon I trust with rapture were it not for song.
Song it is for sure that tears to sorrow owe.
Tears sweeten grief, as song doth sweeten love,
And love doth ever voice itself in song,
As rills in music. So this Song of Love,
Shaped like an Indian maid, sgaun did sing.

GUY'S FOLLY;

OR,

The Secret of Thornton Heath.

BY VANE HERTON ST. JOHN.

CHAPTER VII.—ROSE FLOREY AT HOME.

MY readers will remember that the second attempt upon Guy's Folly was fixed for the sixth night after the fete.

To some extent, however, the robbers had reckoned without their host.

Walter Raymond had imagined that his uncle, amid his profusion of treasures, would not so soon miss his pelf.

It was, as we have seen, for otherwise, for the robbery had at once been perceived, though, under the guise of a Bridge St. Claire, the old miser disgraced deed had fallen upon the wrong shoulders.

For one thing Walter congratulated himself—he had heard the robbery talked of in the neighborhood. He therefore knew that his uncle was aware of the theft, and was thus prevented from running himself heedlessly into danger.

On the other hand, Gideon Crawleigh came to see him, smiling as ever, and quite prepared for any villainy.

Thus the conference took place in the grounds, where all interference was impossible.

"Well," began Crawleigh, "this is to be the night of our second trial."

Walter glanced at him in complete astonishment.

"Our second trial!" he said. "You must be mad."

"Why so?"

"To ask me to go again to my uncle's house, when the robbery is the talk of the neighborhood, is the act of a madman. Why, Guy Raymond will watch his gold like a lynx; he will have sentinels posted at the doors, he will never sleep nor rest until we are discovered. We must defer this till all is quiet, or no has passed."

Gideon's countenance fell.

"I am sorry to hear you speak thus, Walter," he said. "I had hoped you had more courage."

"Courage! Yes, I have abundance of courage; but that is one thing and madness is another. Come, tell me, why are you so eager? Surely you are not yet in want of money."

"I am indeed! I have to tell—"

"Look ah! If you spend two thousand pounds in two days, the Bank of England will not supply your wants. However, as no one thing I am determined—I will act, so go to Guy Raymond's house again and all this matter has been hushed up."

"Very well," returned Crawleigh. "Only, as you command, perhaps you can lend me a few pounds—say a hundred until this proper moment arrives."

Walter took out his pocket-book and drew thence ten ten-pound notes, which he handed to his companion.

Gideon placed them in his pocketbook with a smile.

"They seem little in comparison with what I expected," he said; "but still they are better than nothing. Good evening; I will not come in. Raymond will be glad enough to see me back for me."

With these words he turned upon his heel and left the place.

To explain the unperceived state into which Gideon Crawleigh had fallen is easy.

He had come down to have an interview with Rose Florey at the well he was to carry to her house. He found her seated luxuriously in her drawing-room, surrounded by her books.

She was a handsome girl this Rose Florey, tall and well-proportioned, and walking with considerable dignity.

She had dark hazel eyes and brown hair, a cherry mouth, a full form, and a manner which awed the half-educated.

And now, as she sat in her easy-chair in her morning dress, low in front, and displaying her neck, carved in ivory, dark hair, short like a man's, and whole air of elegance and grace, she was a picture of a finished beauty.

She smiled graciously as Gideon Crawleigh entered, and, removing a cigarette from her cherry lips, said:

"You are punctual, I see, Mr. Crawleigh."

"Yes. Indeed I have need to be, Fancy, under such circumstances."

She laughed slightly.

"Well, perhaps it is," she said. "At any rate, Mr. Fisher is charmed with him as an officer."

Gideon frowned.

"You have deserved me," he said.

"Yes, I have," she replied with candor.

"And you have induced me to come hither in order that I may be outrepped?"

"Not so. Have you the money?"

"Yes."

"Where is it?"

"I have it in my purse."

"Give it to me, then."

He did so.

She rang the bell.

In another moment Mr. Fisher entered the room, and with him a stout man of middle age, whom Gideon regarded with offense.

Mr. Fisher bowed stiffly.

"Mr. Crawleigh, I presume?"

"Yes."

"I have a choice of yours: it has been—then I—influenced. Are you prepared to meet it?"

"Yes; I have this moment given Miss Florey the money."

Rose handed it to Mr. Fisher.

"You see, Mr. Fisher," she said, with one of her blandest smiles, "you see I am a woman of my word."

"Yes, indeed," he answered, as he pocketed the money: "I do so am I a man of my word. Here is the choice."

She handed it to Gideon.

"Is it correct?" she asked.

"Yes," he said, and took it in the fire.

Then her whole aspect suddenly changed. Her eyes became alive of anger, her nostrils dilated into a bitter wreath of scorn, her bosom heaved with emotion, but this time emotion of hate and indignation.

"Now, Mr. Fisher," she cried, "now you can leave my house! Gideon Crawleigh is my friend—my friend because he is a woman's way had, but still a friend. You know well how you have wormed yourself into my confidence, and betrayed it. Go down to my house; and never let me see your face again!"

"But—"

"Say nothing, but go! Your presence is hateful to me. Gideon, ring the bell."

He did so, and in another moment a servant appeared.

"Show these persons out," cried Rose Florey; "and see that they do not enter again."

Mr. Fisher did not think it worth while to make any opposition; so, like a dog with his tail between his legs, he left the room.

Gideon Crawleigh, rendered more comfortable by their departure, sat by the manner which Rose Florey had adopted, drew his chair up close to her side.

"Well, Rosey," he said, "you have done me a great service."

He took her soft little hand in his as he spoke. She drew it away.

"There, don't be making love to me, Gideon," she said. "Those days are over. I expect Sir Arthur here every moment."

"Then why make an appointment with me at this hour?" he said, in a tone of of evident vexation.

"Because I could not help it. Father—the wretch!—would make no other time do for him; so it was necessary that compelled me to choose this hour."

"And what is your special grudge against Fisher?"

"That is my business," said Rose Florey. "It is a secret. How much money have you left?"

"Not much."

"Let me have a hundred."

He took ten crisply drew the required sum from his pocket.

"You will clear me out," he said. "You will, indeed."

Nevertheless he handed it to her, and she placed it in her pocket.

"Clear me out!" she remarked, as she did so—"cleared out! It is better to be so than in prison. And now that I have done with you, be off to think for Gideon, and clear my door now."

Gideon rose.

"With Rose Florey, when at home, he knew this it was absolute madness to argue.

He cast one glance of regretful admiration upon the splendid creature, who he had once deemed all his own, shook her warmly by the hand, and departed.

He went to see of hearing Rose Florey throw her purse in the air in childish play, and laughed merrily.

"What a fool Gideon is," she said to herself, "to fancy that I would allow Sir Arthur Arbuthnot —wretched impostor—to visit me. If I fail everywhere else, I have him for a husband. And I could not endure him for a lover."

So, after a moment, instead of waiting the arrival of Sir Arthur, she went to her dressing-room, prepared herself for a walk, and went out.

Gideon Crawleigh, meanwhile, went towards home, pondered himself for a journey also, and took his way towards a neighboring town.

There he dined, and at six o'clock entered Bevan's Hotel.

Bevan's Hotel was the resort of all the black sheep of the fashionable world and its surroundings, speculative tradesmen on the verge of bankruptcy, swells from London who were compelled to avoid their creditors, and everybody else who belonged to country families who considered it "the thing" to associate with ideologies.

To gain entrance to Bevan's" must have appeared a nothing beyond an ordinary hotel, having its usual large coffee and dining-rooms, reading-room, and private suites, as well as its elegant waiters.

But to the initiated, the rear only of the premises presented attractions.

There was a billiard and a skittle-alley, a billiard-room, a roulette-table, and various other minor sources of improvishment and wealth.

It was in the latter that Gideon Crawleigh took his way on quitting Rose Florey.

He was a desperate gambler, and was considered lucky.

Such, however, had turned against him of late; and since his acquisition of stolen property, his fortune had been worse than ever.

He had only fifty pounds left when Rose Florey dismissed her loan; but Rose possessed over him, as she did over every one, an apparently unlimited power, and he could not refuse her a fiver.

Here, however, at the roulette-table, where he made no pretence of being very particular, he hoped to recover his losses, and he entered the room with a sort of defiant air, which effectually proved to all present his determination to play.

The "pigeons" were plucked. The "rooks" were disgusted.

The former looked upon him as a new boon companion, but the others regarded him as an interference to their own particular game.

But again Fortune frowned on Gideon.

Every coin left his pocket ere he quitted the room.

One hundred pounds which he afterwards borrowed from Walter Raymond was carried to the same room, but with a different effect.

He won back his losses.

Then among the crowd there appeared a new face. This was Ralph St. Clare, and upon him Gideon Crawleigh at once fixed as his special victim.

HOW THE ROTHSCHILDS MANAGED.

WHEN Napoleon returned from the Isle of Elba, the anxiety of Nathan Rothschild knew no bounds, and during the great days he went to Belgium, following in the wake of Wellington's army. Eager to gather the earliest information of events, which, he felt, would settle the fate of Europe for years to come, he did not even shrink from the perils of the field of battle. On the morning of the 18th of June, 1815, he rode on a quiet house, listed at Brussels, over the ground in front of the Chateau of Hougoumont, close to the village of Waterloo. He was in company with a number of men all worth nothing. The first was Count Bernstorff, Prussian Ambassador to the British Court; the second Nathan Rothschild and the third Hougoumont; and the fourth a man worth hundreds of millions. All are agreed the whole field was enveloped in smoke, which rendered it impossible for either army to see what the French Emperor were now in full retreat. It was not until the Duke of Wellington perceived the advance of the great battle of Waterloo was won—was won for him by the indomitable courage of the British troops, and the skill and coolness of his generals. Here a cavalier was ready to ride off with the news. At the break of day on the 19th of June, Nathan Rothschild found himself at the coast of Ostend, and there he hired a fishing-boat, in which he and all the Stock Exchange by a furious sea and waves destroyed everything in their path. It was in the year 500, 000 francs to be carried across the stormy from the Channel. Off Margate the wind fell, and they would gave 2,000 francs, and the bargain was struck, a poor fisherman undertaking at the risk to gain 2,000 francs his wife and children.

The news which cavalry Cæsar and his fortune sped swiftly over the waves a sudden change in the Stock Exchange, and the astonishing the prospects to unexpected degrees. The sun was still on the horizon when Nathan Rothschild, with a heart lightened without waiting, engaged the swiftest horses to carry him on to London.

There was gloom in Threadneedle street, and gloom in the Stock Exchange, when Nathan arrived. Nathan Rothschild when he appeared on the morning of the 20th was a disappointed man in the Stock Exchange. He whispered to a few of his most intimate friends that the battle was lost and won by the Duke Wellington, and he had been defeated by Napoleon in the great battle of the day before. The report spread like fire and gloom—no one knew what had become of the handful of men who had crossed the sea.

The funds were opened the whole day, and fell to the lowest depths. Then, at three o'clock, Nathan Rothschild's known agents sold with the rest, more than 1,000,000 of money. Then, at four o'clock, Nathan Rothschild was known agents bought at forty-five. The funds rose to fifty-five by the evening of the following day, and on the 21st they were at the 53rd of the 22nd nearly two days after the arrival of Nathan in London, the news arrived of the complete overthrow of Waterloo, and the utter rout of the Napoleonic host not however, Nathan Rothschild, with his spy, was the first to inform his friends at the stock Exchange of the victory of the Duke of Wellington, and to whom the hour before it was given, to his general public. Needless to say that Nathan's profits from the day had fallen so soon as the official reports were published of the battle of Waterloo.

Waterloo enriched the house of Rothschild by about four millions sterling, and laid the foundation of a house upon power for the descendants of Meyer Amschel, the poor broker of Frankfort-on-the-Maine.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.—The words of the English language are a compound of several foreign languages. The English language may be looked upon as a compilation, both in words and expressions, of various dialects. Their origin is from the Saxon language. Our laws were derived from the Normans, our military terms from the French, scientific names from the Greek, and our stock of nouns from the Latin, through the medium of the French. Almost all the verbs in the English language are taken from the German, and nearly every noun or adjective is taken from other dialects. The English language is composed of 15,753 words—of which 6,732 are from the Latin, 4,613 from the French, 1,505 from the Saxon, 1,000 from the Greek, 691 from the Dutch, 214 from the Danish, 106 from the German (not including verbs) 90 from the Welch, 74 from the Scotch, 66 from the Spanish, 60 from the Icelandic, 51 from the Hebrew, 15 from the Teutonic, and the remainder from the Arabic, Syriac, Turkish, Portuguese, Irish, Scotch, and other languages.

TOMB OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

IN February, 1861, Abraham Lincoln, the President elect, left Springfield to assume one of the most perplexing positions ever occupied by man. Nobly has he gone through the ordeal, sanctified by his martyrdom. On May 3rd, 1865, his mortal remains were solemnly conveyed to that same little county town, and deposited in the tomb erected since his assassination.

The place where his loved and honored remains repose is Oak Ridge Cemetery, a public burial place, about two miles from Springfield, and here the monument will be raised to the memory of a man who will always rank after Washington in the memory of every true American. Bishop Simpson made a very appropriate address on the occasion, in which he feelingly drew the honest patriot, who, at the same time, was as regardful as he was simple-minded. Our space will only permit us to add what our Special Artist says: "Nothing could exceed the solemnity and deep sorrow that hung on every face of the great crowd of spectators that witnessed the close of the funeral honors to our departed President. It seemed as though they had lost not only their chief magistrate, but their most valued friend."

THE SOLITARY HYDRANT IN LIBBEY PRISON.

We were betrayed into an inaccuracy last week in giving credit to the wrong photographers in our captions to the Chicago pictures. The very brilliant views, of which we exhibit ourselves for these engravings, were not by Anschutz, as stated, but by Mr. S. M. Fassett, 114 and 116 South Clark street, Chicago, who was too modest at first to put his name to his pictures.

EMIGRATION TO MEXICO.

THE headquarters of Col. W. H. Allen, corner of Howard and Crosby streets, were opened the beginning of last week for the enrollment of emigrants for Mexico, and were immediately besieged with applicants eager to join in the movement; hundreds of starved men registered their names on the books. Among the applicants were numbers of sailors and other persons who have seen service in the United States navy. The rush of discharged soldiers and army officers to join in the expedition was perfectly surprising. The enrolment clerks were kept busy, and the enthusiasm continuing, if became necessary for Col. Allen to establish branch offices in various parts of the city. The success of this quiet appeal to the American public, it is said, has astounded the agents of President Juarez, who had no idea when they commenced operations here that the response would be so over whelming. Gen. Creigh, it is stated, expresses himself as immensely satisfied over the manner in which his plans are working, and apprehends no serious obstacles to the triumphal issue of his expedition.

AMBULANCE OWNED BY THE U. S. ENGINE CO., PHILADELPHIA.

THE good people of Philadelphia, ever since the war broke out, have been very sensitive to the soldiers passing through their city. Two large restaurants have been in constant operation for four years in feeding the brave boys; and a number of hospitals, some of them very large, are located either in the city or in the healthiest part of the suburbs. A want occurred, in removing the invalid heroes from the railroad depots to these charitable institutions, and this has been met by the firemen of Philadelphia in the manner represented in our engraving. The various fire companies vie with each other in the splendor and luxury of these carriages. There are 36 of them altogether. They can be summoned all at once from their various locations, for immediate duty in transporting wounded men from the hospital near the Baltimore railroad depot to the large one at a distance—the most commodious of which is at Chestnut Hill, 10 miles north-west of the city.

The Chief-Engineer of the Philadelphia Fire Department, David M. Lyle, has shown himself creditably active in attending to these duties of mercy, which, in a technical sense, are altogether outside of the claims of his office. In May also-a, 1864, 24,000 men were safely and commodiously transported by his means.

AMBULANCE OF THE U. S. FIRE ENGINE COMPANY, PHILADELPHIA, PA., FOR TRANSPORTING WOUNDED SOLDIERS TO THE HOSPITALS.—SKETCHED BY F. SCHELL.

THAT most flippant of diplomatic sages, Prince Schwarzenburg, was so greatly important as to remark sneeringly to Lord Ward, that English diplomatists spoke shocking bad French. "Ah," said the English noblesse to the Austrian statesman, "you must remember that we have not had the advantage of having our capital cities so often occupied by French troops as some of the continental nations."

ONE of the officers investigating the case of the murder in question a few days since, who is in some way connected with the affair, she kept diligently asserting that "Shady me feared I don't know anything about it, and whoby me heaven I don't tell an untruth, for I never told a lie in my life," keeping on in her voluble assertions till at length the officer quietly interrupted her with the assurance that it did not much matter to him what she revealed, but it might be better for her, at which she became a little indignant and asked what they could do with her if she knew about the matter and wouldn't tell it. "Why," responded the officer, "in case you prove to be implicated as much as I am afraid you are, you might be hanged." At this reply she was a trifle moved and said: "Justice should be tempered with clemency." Said the officer in conclusion: "Ah, yes, my dear madam, but you forget that the clemency man is dead." For the first time the lady saw it in that light and wept.

Read! Read!!

The spirit of Nationality which has fired the American heart ever since the rebellion sought the overthrow of our country's prosperity has been productive of many changes—many new inventions.

THE UNION CARDS

have already revolutionized the card trade, and still the work is only commenced. So great has been the demand for these Cards that the Company has scarcely been able to supply one grade, without attempting the manufacture of other qualities. By the increased facilities which have been added, through great expense, they are now prepared to fill all orders on the day received, and the cordial co-operation of all who love the EAGLE, SHIELD, STARS and FLAG OF THE UNION is respectfully invited.

Of how much more significance are our National Emblems than the homely, meaningless characters used to designate the suits in the old style of cards. Kings, Queens and Jacks are played out! Clubs and Spades no more!!

COLONELS remove Kings; the GODDESS OF LIBERTY scorns Queens; and the MAJOR is high to any Jack in Christendom. In order to secure your interest in the general circulation of the UNION CARDS, the following prices have been established, at which you will be supplied:

2 Packs sent by mail, postpaid, for - $1 00
12 Packs sent by mail, postpaid, - $5 00

Simpson, and tenderly carried to the hearse, the city bands playing a solemn funeral dirge, called "Lincoln's Funeral March," composed expressly for the occasion by Charles Hess.—Vide New York Times, May 1st.

Dr. Talbot's Concentrated Medical

is a PREVENTIVE of SICKNESS. The experience that Dr. Talbot has had for the last Twenty-five years convinces him that it is time the public had an article offered that will prevent sickness. The article offered is Dr. Talbot's Medicated Pineapple Cider, designed for all classes, old and young. It is not new to the Doctor, but is entirely new to the public. One quart bottle will last a well person one year. This is rather a new mode of doctoring; nevertheless it will save millions from being sick. Is it not better to pay three dollars a year to keep from being sick, than to pay ten or twenty dollars in doctor's bills, and as much more for the loss of time and the inconvenience of being sick? To prevent sickness, use as follows: Add one teaspoonful of Medicated Pineapple Cider to a tumbler of cold water, and drink the first thing after you rise in the morning, and the same before you retire at night. It will increase the strength and give vigor and action to the system. A celebrated New York merchant, who has made a thorough trial of the Pineapple Cider, assures Dr. Talbot that he gained ten pounds of flesh in one month at the first trial. He continues its use as above directed, and finds it very beneficial; says it has proved an entire preventive to sickness in his case. Also, another well-known gentleman in New York has used the Medicated Cider constantly for ten years, and has not been sick one day during that time.

This wonderful Preparation will increase the strength, give vigor and action to the system, and regulate digestion. When taken internally, for pains of all kinds, Bilious Colic, Diarrhea, Diseases of the Throat, Pains in the Chest, Hoarseness, Coughs, Neuralgia, Rheumatic Pains, Dyspepsia, Acidity of the Stomach, etc., etc., its soothing and quieting effect on the system is most astonishing.

Dr. Wilcox, an eminent physician, employed it with great success in treating Fevers, Dyspepsia, Nervous Affections, Loss of Appetite, Weakness, Palpitation of the Heart, Chronic Diarrhea, Colic Dysentery, and Diseases of the Stomach and Bowels. It is also particularly recommended by physicians to delicate females, and as an excellent remedy for Enfeebled Digestion, Want of Appetite, Scrofula, Nephritic Affections, Rheumatism, etc., etc. It never fails to relieve Nervous Tremor, Wakefulness, Disturbed Sleep, etc. American ladies have used this article with great success to heighten their color and beauty. It imparts cheerfulness to the disposition and brilliancy to the complexion. To travellers especially it is of inestimable value, and should be provided as a medicine for every journey in which the water is likely to vary in quality and tendency. Persons residing in any part of the country may adopt it with the utmost confidence as a timely, efficacious remedy.

A Very Good Novel.
"THE OLD LOVE AND THE NEW."

BY THE AUTHOR OF THE "HENPECKED HUSBAND," "THE MARRYING MAN," "THE FLIRT," &c., &c.

The author of this novel is a person of unquestionable talent, and deeply read in the mysteries of the human character. To attempt to sketch a tale in which incident succeeds incident with unflagging rapidity, were impossible; we must therefore content ourselves with exciting curiosity by earnestly recommending a very good novel to the admirers of this class of reading.—London Weekly Dispatch.

ARRANDALE & CO., Manufacturers' Agents,
No. 167 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Announce that all the above list of goods will be sold for One Dollar each.

In consequence of the great stagnation of trade in the manufacturing districts of England, through the war having cut off the supply of cotton, a large quantity of Valuable Jewellery, originally intended for the English market, has been sent off for sale in this country, and MUST BE SOLD AT ANY SACRIFICE!

Under these circumstances, ARRANDALE & CO., acting as Agents for the principal European Manufacturers, have resolved upon a Great Gift Distribution, subject to the following regulations:

CERTIFICATES of the various articles are first put into envelopes indiscriminately, sealed up, and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus showing no favoritism.

On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you are to have, and then it is at your option to send the dollar and take the article or not. Purchasers may thus obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, or any Set of Jewellery on our list for ONE DOLLAR.

Send 25 Cents for Certificate.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be enclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for 10; and a hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—We want agents in every regiment, and in every town and county in the country, and those acting as such will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered for them, provided their remittance amounts to One Dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents by every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage Stamps.
ARRANDALE & CO.,
167 Broadway, New York.

What the "Press" say of Us.

GREAT GIFT DISTRIBUTION.—A rare opportunity is offered for obtaining watches, chains, diamond rings, silverware, etc., by Messrs. Arrandale & Co., at No. 167 Broadway. They have an immense stock of articles, varying in value, and all are offered for $1 each. The distribution is very fairly done—you agree to take a certificate of a certain article, enclosed in an envelope, and are not required to pay your dollar unless you are satisfied with the article, which will certainly be worth more than that amount, and may be $50 or $100. An excellent mode this of investing a dollar.—Sunday Times, New York City, Feb. 19, 1865.

Messrs. Arrandale & Co. have long been personally known to us, and we believe them to be every way worthy of public confidence.—New York Scottish American Journal, June 11, 1864.

We have inspected, at the office of Arrandale & Co.'s Agency for European Manufacturing Jewellery, a large assortment of fashionable and valuable jewellery of the newest patterns. We also noticed a large quantity of silver-plate, and understand that the whole of those newly-imported articles are to be disposed of on a novel principle, giving great advantages to buyers, and affording extensive employment to agents. We know the firm in question to be a very respectable and thoroughly worthy of public confidence, and recommend our friends to read their advertisement.—New York Albion, Sept. 3, 1864.

By Messrs. Arrandale & Co's arrangement, the advantages must be on the side of the customer, for he has everything to gain, and nothing comparatively to lose. He knows what he will get for his dollar beforehand, and he need not send it if he is not satisfied.—New York Weekly News, Aug. 6, 1864.

EMPLOYMENT FOR LADIES.—The most eligible and profitable employment we have heard of for ladies is the sale of certificates for the "Great Gift Distribution" of Arrandale & Co. A lady of our acquaintance has been very successful in this way, not only filling her own purse, but also in doing a good turn to those to whom she sold the Certificates, as will be seen from our advertising columns. Gentlemen can also be thus engaged.—New York Sunday Mercury, Aug. 14, 1864.

In our columns the reader will find an advertisement of Arrandale & Co.'s Gift Distribution of watches, jewellery and silver-ware. In payment of that advertisement we received several sets of the jewellery advertised, and we are warranted in saying that, both in finish and quality, they quite exceeded our expectations. They turned out to be just what they had been represented.—True Democrat (Lewistown), Aug. 17, 1864.

The British Whig of Kingston, C. W., says, Nov. 26, 1864, one of our lady subscribers became an agent for Arrandale & Co., and by request brought some 20 articles, sent as prizes for her agency, to this office for inspection, and without hesitation we can state that each and all of the articles were worth treble the amount of cost to the recipients, and some of them six times.

Messrs. T. & H. GAUGHAN & Co., No. 116 Broadway New York, extensive Manufacturers and Importers of all the leading and most fashionable styles of Watches and Jewellery, desiring to increase their business to an unlimited extent, have resolved upon a great Gift Distribution, subject to the regulations following: Certificates, naming each article and its value, are placed in sealed envelopes and well mixed. One of these envelopes will be sent by mail to any address, on receipts of 25 cents.

All articles sold at $1 each, without regard to value.

On receipt of the certificate you will see what you are going to have, and then it is at your option to send the dollar and take the article or not. Purchasers may thus obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, or any set of Jewellery on our list for $1, and in no case can they get less that $1's worth, as there are no blanks. The price of certificates is as follows: 1 for 25 cents; 5 for £1; 11 for $2; 30 for $5; 65 for $10; 100 for $15. Agents will be allowed 10 cents on every certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to $1. Agents will collect 25 cents for every certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps.

NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1864, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 505—Vol. XX.] NEW YORK, JUNE 3, 1865. [PRICE 10 CENTS. $4 00 YEARLY. (3 WEEKS $1 00.

The Assassination—Complicity of Davis.

THE evidence elicited in the great trial of the persons arrested for complicity in the murder of the President, and in the attempt on the life of Mr. Seward, establishes the fact that there existed a deeply-laid and widespread conspiracy, more than a year in maturing first, for the abduction or assassination of the President; and secondly, for wholesale piracy on the Lakes and incendiarism in our Northern cities. The agents in this conspiracy had their headquarters in Washington, and the leaders revolved between Richmond and Canada. It is proved that both Booth and Surratt went often within the rebel lines, and had communication with the rebel authorities. It is proved that Booth and Beale, who was hung, for, among other things, the attempt to burn New York, not only met in conference in the Shenandoah Valley, but that the latter was sent, with the Lake pirates and St. Albans raiders into Canada, by authority of the rebel government, on what was called "detached service." The connection between the gang in Canada, for whom, it will be remembered, Mr. Davis claimed the rights of "belligerents," on the ground that they were commissioned by him and assigned by him on special service—we say the connection between these robbers, incendiaries, and murderers, and the gang assigned to the "detached service" of abducting or murdering the President is complete. That Mr. Davis knew about the scheme of burning our cities, and of "carrying alarm and consternation throughout the North," is shown by documents under his own hand. The testimony is not yet all in, and there is some which has not yet been made public, which may prove direct complicity on the part of Mr. Davis in the plot to assassinate Mr. Lincoln and his Cabinet. Be that as it may, it is established by evidence and logical deduction that he was fully acquainted with and approved that part of the conspiracy, which Beale and Kennedy and their associates failed to accomplish in New York, but in which Burley and the St. Albans robbers and murderers were more successful. Cognizant of one part of the plot, he could not be ignorant of the other. Viewed as a crime, the heinousness of attempting to burn crowded hotels and theatres, and threw railway trains from the track, far exceeds that of the murderer of any man, even though he be a President. The man who would not shrink from the former crime, certainly would not hesitate at the latter. The man who could commission ruffians for such kind of "detached service," would look upon assassination with complacency if not approval. The moral obliquity and unscrupulousness which could tolerate the one would not reject the other.

The greater crime involves the less, and if Jefferson Davis could entertain in his black heart, corroded by treason, the monstrous scheme of wholesale and indiscriminate murders for which he commissioned men, whose subsequent acts he approved and avowed, the world will be prepared to believe him not only a consenting but co-operating party to a scheme of assassination, which, if carried out successfully, would enure most to his benefit, real or supposed. Especially will men believe it, when they find the instruments of incendiarism and those to whom was assigned the work of assassination, not only frequenting the same haunts and retreats, but in almost constant conference and consultation—now in Richmond, now in the Shenandoah Valley, and anon in Canada, obtaining their supplies from the same source, and steadily acting in concert. The frontier was to be invaded, the torch to be applied in New York, and the President and his Cabinet were to fall, simultaneously. It was thus that "horror and consternation were to be carried into the North; such was the plan which Sanders wholly or in part revealed to the British spy, Sala, and which he said, if carried out, would "make the world shudder."

The leaders of the rebellion, writhing under defeat and disgrace, seek naturally enough to shake off the onus of this last and monstrous crime. But it will be without avail. It occurred too late to be of service to them—there is the rub—and its weight sinks to a lower depth of infamy a cause already borne down by deeds of blackness unparalleled in human history—Fort Pillow massacres, systematic starvation of prisoners, piratical burning on the high seas, St. Albans raids and incendiary schemes. Had the above plot been successful, six months ago, before Sherman had cut his way through the very vitals of the rebellion, while yet there was an imposing army in the field, Mr. Mason would not have been so fast to express his detestation of the deed, and we should have had none of the abhorrence of it which the rebel leaders now affect with so much ostentation. Their "sentiments of horror and indignation" would have never made themselves heard through the wild yell of delight and exultation which would have rung out from the printing houses of Richmond. The death of the "ape," the "baboon," "besotted idiot," "brutal tyrant,"—these are the phrases by which the simple, earnest and faithful Lincoln was always designated in the Southern press—would have been hailed with frantic and demoniac joy through the South, and we shall deceive ourselves if we accept any expressions of regret or sorrow over the foul deed, on the part of the rebel leaders in general, as anything beyond an effort to rid themselves of the odium of an act which they regret only because it came too late to be serviceable, but not too late to grave deep in the heart of the nation the great truth which it was all too likely to forget, that "treason is the greatest of all crimes and should be punished accordingly."

CAPTURE OF JEFF. DAVIS.

The correspondent of the Tribune gives the following graphic account of the arch traitor:

"Through the kindness of Lieut.-Col. Pritchard, in charge of the prisoners, your correspondent was permitted to visit the steamer, and learned from the colonel and others the particulars of the capture, which was made by a detachment of 128 men of the 4th Michigan cavalry, under Lieut.-Col. B. D. Pritchard, about one mile from Irwinsville, Ga., and about 100 miles southeast from Macon. The colonel learned on the 9th inst. where they were encamped, and just before daylight on the 10th surrounded the camp. It was supposed that Davis had a considerable force as guard, and a severe fight was expected. By an unfortunate and so far unaccountable accident, one part of the force fired upon another, and before the mistake was discovered two men were killed and six others slightly wounded. Capt. Hudson had placed a strong guard around the tent where Davis was supposed to to be, and when the firing commenced, thinking his duty called him to the fight, he left the tent in charge of a corporal with orders to let no one pass out. The corporal went to the door, where he was met by a lady, who proved to be Mrs. Davis, and who said that the tent was occupied by ladies, and she hoped they would be permitted to dress without being disturbed.

"Very soon, she again and voluntarily appeared at the door, with another person in petticoats, morning dress and a woollen cloak, with a hood closely drawn over the head and a pail on her arm.

"Corporal ordered halt! which was of course obeyed, but Mrs. D. feelingly appealed to the corporal to allow her mother to go to the spring for a pail of water—it was hard, even if they were prisoners, not to be allowed to get a little water for their morning ablutions. Mr. corporal just then observed that the morning dress was not quite long enough to conceal a pair of boots looking rather too heavy for "mother" to wear, and, with his Spencer carbine presented to the aged lady's head, ordered her to remove that cloak. The argument was persuasive, even to the chivalry. The disguise was removed and Jeff. Davis appeared in full view.

"Davis said that he should have defended himself if he had been armed—even if he had had a revolver he would have fought with it as long as he could. The colonel replied to him, that he didn't appear to be in a very good fighting condition just at that time."

This day is Published,

the First Number of the Chimney Corner.

A NEW FAMILY NEWSPAPER.

The Chimney Corner will have always a continuous tale of a superior and unexceptionable order. It opens with a most exciting story from one of the most popular authors of the day. Each number will also have a variety of shorter stories from our best American writers, Sketches of Travel and of Society, Anecdotes of Natural History, Biography, Poetry, Agricultural and Horticultural Suggestions and Illustrations, Recipes, Family Medical Prescriptions, Notes and Queries, Parlor Pastimes, Merry Thoughts, Comic Pictures, Portraits and Illustrations, in the best style of American art.

The Chimney Corner starts with a select corps of upwards of two hundred contributors, and has a complete editorial staff of established ability and large experience. It starts assured of success, and of gathering together a circle of readers which will widen daily, and to which it will prove an instructor and an entertaining friend and guest.

In addition to these literary attractions The Chimney Corner will be the most elaborately illustrated Family Paper ever published, the designs being made expressly for it by the most eminent Artists.

Every number will also contain a most striking and correct portrait, exquisitely engraved, with an original biography of some eminent person, who has risen by his own exertions to a distinguished position in our Great Republic. This series will be termed:

"The Self-Made Men of our Times."

With Nos. 1 and 2 of The Chimney Corner will be presented, gratuitously, a magnificent plate, entitled:

Grand Reception of the Notabilities of the Nation at the White House, 1865.

The picture contains nearly 100 portraits of our most celebrated Generals, Statesmen and Civilians, also of many of our most distinguished American ladies. The likenesses are admirable, having been taken from photographs by Brady.

This is the most costly gift plate ever presented by any publisher in the United States, having been produced at an expense of $10,000.

Every family should possess this truly national picture, and carefully preserve it, as it will transmit to future generations the men who have restored our great national unity. It is especially valuable, as it contains an excellent likeness of our late lamented President, introducing General Grant and his wife to Mrs. Lincoln. This costly plate is the first of a series which it is our intention to present to our regular subscribers.

The Chimney Corner will be issued every Tuesday in New York.

It is electrotyped, and back numbers can be had by ordering the same of any News Agent.

The Third Series of Seven-Thirties.

The great success of the 7-30 Loan must always be looked upon as one of the most powerful evidences of the strength of the United States Government, and of its strong hold upon the confidence and affections of the people. On Saturday, May 13th, the subscriptions were over thirty million dollars, and for the week ending on that day, over ninety-eight million dollars, and in the three months that the Loan has been in charge of Mr. Jay Cooke, over five hundred million dollars. These large receipts will enable the Treasury to pay off our armies as they are disbanded, and to rapidly discharge the various obligations that have been incurred during the war. This will show that a great war-debt to individuals has never before been so promptly paid; and we think all will agree that Secretary McCulloch deserves great credit for the ability he has manifested, not only in securing the means, but for the financial skill he has displayed in so directing these vast receipts and disbursments as not for a moment to disturb the equilibrium of commerce, embarrass individuals, or in any way tighten the money market. It is doubtless true that the Secretary of the Treasury might have negotiated the remainder of his loans at six per cent. interest instead of 7-30, but so much valuable time would necessarily have been lost in popularizing a new loan that the great object of the Government, viz., an immediate supply of money sufficient to pay all the debts incident to the war, would have been defeated; and besides, the difference of interest would not have been equal to three days' expenses. The policy may have looked "penny wise," but the best financial authorities, as well as common sense, pronounced it "pound foolish." As it is—and will be, no soldier will go home without his greenbacks, and the floating debt in the shape of vouchers, requisitions, &c., will be wiped out as rapidly as the proper officers can audit and adjust the accounts.

The Second Series of the 7-30 Loan was exhausted on Saturday, May 13th. On Monday, the Secretary of the Treasury authorized Jay Cooke, the general Subscription Agent for U. S. Securities, to receive subscriptions for $230,000,000 of a Third Series, which is all that is authorized by Congress, and is without doubt the last loan at this high rate of interest that will be offered by the Government.

There is no change in the terms or conditions of this Third Series, except that the Government reserves the right of paying interest at six per cent. in gold instead of seven and three-tenths in currency—a right which would pre-suppose a return to specie payments, and make six per cent. in gold even better than the higher rate in currency—a consummation most devoutly to be wished.

The privilege of converting the notes into 5-20 six per cent. gold bonds at the end of three years, or receiving payment at maturity, at the holder's option, is retained.

The first day of the Third Series opened with a subscription of a fraction of five millions, and the month of June will certainly see the last of the 7-30's out of market. How early in June we cannot predict, but parties who wish to make sure of a portion would do well to be in time.

Full particulars may be found in our advertising columns.

Andrew Johnson.

There is, we think, little danger that Mr. Johnson will be so much misunderstood, misrepresented, or maligned abroad as his predecessor. In the first place, because Europe cannot fail to feel the stings and repinings of conscience as regards its wanton injustice to President Lincoln; and in the second place, because Mr. Johnson stands in control of a power never so formidable as now, and has proved himself capable of wielding it with the greatest effect. The London Times never committed so great a blunder as when, on the receipt of the news of President Lincoln's assassination, it called on Mr. Johnson "to resign." That journal is painfully conscious of its error. It has found out that an experienced, firm and steady hand is at the helm of State in America. It has found out, and all Europe has suddenly made the discovery, that the President of the United States is not the illiterate, drunken boor which even Mr. Lincoln was at one time represented to be, but a practiced statesman, with a public career much longer and wider than that of his predecessor, and with a record marked throughout by distinguished ability, unsullied purity, lofty patriotism, and rare decision and persistence. A legislator in his own State, thrice its Governor through the choice of its people in times of peace, twice its Senator in Congress, and subsequently its military Governor, and filling all these positions with judgment, energy and dignity—a man who has been all this can be no ordinary politician. And when we consider that he was all this, with no advantages of birth, in spite of a defective early education, but rose from a humble and contemned occupation, to be the head of a State in which all political positions have been regarded as almost the exclusive heritage of an overbearing social and landed aristocracy, when we consider all this, we must discern in Andrew Johnson the elements of a man born to be a leader of men, and eminently fitted to be President of the United States, at a time when the qualities for which he is most distinguished are precisely those which are most required in the Executive of the nation.

The London Spectator of the 6th of May, has a very able and appreciative article on the new President. It does not fail to see that we have a very original, able and powerful man, (it suggests the possibility of "a very dangerous one") in Andrew Johnson. It warns European statesmen that, "He is no feeble ruler, sure to be a tool in the hands of his secretaries or the parties around him, any more than the drunken rough elevated by an accident and incapable of an idea, but a strong, self-reliant man, accustomed to rule, and to rule in a revolution, with a policy as distinct as that of the oldest European statesman, and a will which, be that policy wise or rash, will assuredly make resistance to it a most dangerous task."

"He is a ruler," it continues, "who, whatever else he may do or leave undone, will most assuredly rule; who will borrow knowledge, but accept advice only when it harmonizes with his own convictions. A man who, born a Southerner, raised himself into the idol of slaveowning democrats, and then, convinced that slavery was an evil, flung himself down from his position, down to the very bottom, a homeless, landless, friendless man, and then fought his way back to the very top as chief of the anti-slavery democrats, is not the man to be 'guided' by softer politicians. Andrew Johnson, unless we mistake utterly all the indications of his life, is simply Andrew Jackson over again, and we are not certain whether the repetition of the character is not conscious, whether Mr. Johnson has not recognised his resemblance to that prototype and modelled himself to make the resemblance visible. He is always talking of him, always quoting him, and the accidental analogy of careers must frequently have struck him. Like Jackson, Mr. Johnson was born in the Carolinas, a poor, if not a 'mean' white, he says—'I picked cotton as an apprentice, and picked twice as much as any slave'—and like him emigrated to Tennessee, and there became the idol of the Democracy. Like him, too, he contracted, apparently through the force of an imagination which requires strong ideas to stir it, a passion for the Union, and therefore a resolution to defend it at all times by all means legal and lawless equally. Had Jackson been encountered, as he was threatened, with a slaveholders' revolt, he would, we can hardly doubt, have passed, as Mr. Johnson has done, onwards from resisting slaveowners to an iron determination that slavery should end—end, as the new President says, 'now, unconditionally, for ever,' so that no State shall have the power to re-establish it. On that point there is in Mr. Johnson's mind no possibility of truce or compromise."

We think the Spectator is wrong in supposing, that while Mr. Johnson has, from the begining of his career, been an ardent and unflinching advocate of the sovereignty of the people, and of the doctrine that all government should only be the expressed and tangible form of the people's will, that therefore he would carry out that doctrine which is knit into the very texture of his mind and is supreme in his heart, "by the majesty of mere volition which laws human and divine were alike intended to limit." Respect for the Constitution and laws, nor yet our duty of obedience, does not compel us to submit to national extinction and the destruction of the very system for which the Constitution and laws were formed. Self-preservation is the first instinct and duty of nations as well as individuals.

The strong expressions used by Johnson, and from which the Spectator draws very wide inferences, were uttered when Jefferson Davis, the plotters of treason and the leaders of the rebellion, were standing defiantly in their places in the Senate, proclaiming that the nation must die, because there was nothing in the Constitution to authorise it to attempt to save its existence; just as though the people could be deceived by fallacies like these, or led to slaughter bound helplessly with cords twisted of the wind. Mr. Johnson maintained that the Constitution and the laws of the country did authorise the Government to maintain its integrity and put down treason. If it did not, he was ready, and the people behind him, to assert themselves in their primary capacity, and let Constitutions perish so that the people survived. Mr. Johnson only expressed the sense and determination of the American people when he asked unanswerably—"What are Governments? They come from the people; you are the people, hence you can do no wrong! * * The people must sometimes take the law into their own hands, and do desperate and irregular acts to save the life of the nation."

The Spectator proceeds as follows, quoting an extract from one of Mr. Johnson's speeches in Nashville, a paragraph which proclaims bugle-like notes, what manner of man is he who stands to-day at the head of the American people. "The salus reipublicæ is as supreme an object in his mind as ever it was in the mind of a Roman patrician or a Parisian Septembrisor. There is nothing that we know of in that which Englishmen can blame. We also should do strong acts if the life of the nation required them, we also indeed did do them when only the future of a dependency was in the question. But the tendency of Mr. Johnson's mind is to do them when it is possible to dispense with them, to prefer strong measures to legal means as the swifter and more direct road. Thus he rejected Mr. Lincoln's plan of emancipating for service to the Union as too tardy and incomplete, and hurried back to Tennessee to secure permanent, uncompensated emancipation by a constitutional change. To secure it he had almost to overturn society by a system of test oaths, but he thought the 'emergency' warranted that 'desperate' remedy, and he succeeded in his design. A convention of loyal men abolished slavery for ever, but even this was too slow for the self-willed Governor. While the discussion was still going on, he stood one evening on the steps of the State Capitol, and there uttered these remarkable words:

"Colored men of Nashville, you have all heard of the President's proclamation, by which he announced to the world that the slaves in a large portion of the seceded States were thenceforth and for ever free. For certain reasons, which seemed wise to the President, the benefits of that proclamation did not extend to you or to your native State. Many of you, consequently, were left in bondage. The taskmaster's scourge was not yet broken, and the fetters still galled your limbs. Gradually this iniquity has been passing away, but the hour has come when the last vestiges of it must be removed. Consequently, I, too, without reference to the President or any other person, have a proclamation to make, and, standing here upon the steps of the Capitol, with the past history of the State to witness, the present condition to guide, and its future to encourage me, I, Andrew Johnson, do hereby proclaim freedom, full, broad and unconditional, to every man in Tennessee!"

On the arrival of the news of the murder of President Lincoln in London, the members of the House of Commons present in the day session signed the following address and sent it at once to Mr. Adams:

"We, the undersigned members of the British House of Commons, have learned with the deepest horror and regret, that the President of the United States of America has been deprived of life by an act of violence, and we desire to express our sympathy on the sad event with the American Minister now in London, as well as to declare our hope and confidence in the future of that great country, which we trust will continue to be associated with enlightened freedom and peaceful relations with this and every other country.
"London, April 26, 1865."

The subject of a new National Hymn has been started again in Boston, notwithstanding the wretched failure of the attempt of a few years ago to elicit one through the vulgar means of a prize—one thousand dollars, for "the best." The absence of a really good National Hymn may perhaps be admitted, but as we are mere New York sinners (and New York is the wickedest place in the world, of course), we regard "Hail Columbia," the "Star Spangled Banner," or even "Old John Brown," with Mrs. Howe's words, or with the refrain:

"We'll hang Jeff. Davis on a sour apple tree," as good enough for us. We are not insensible, however, to the criticism of a correspondent of our lively contemporary, the Boston Transcript, who says:

"An objection to the use of the music of the "Star-Spangle Banner" is the very wide range of the notes, they running over nearly an octave and a half of the scale, far too great a range for general voices. Both the words and the music of a proper American National Anthem are yet unwritten, and there remains yet unused the opportunity of a very desirable good repute to both the poet and the musician who shall accomplish the needed good work."

If we have had a more hostile and malignant critic abroad, whether as regards our politics, our military operations or our literature, than the London Saturday Review, we have failed to ascertain the fact. There is no periodical in Europe written with more general ability, certainly none with less fairness than this Saturday Review. There has been no possible prediction of disaster to the armies of the nation, no possible laudation of those whom we have stigmatised as "rebels," in which this able, prejudiced and unscrupulous periodical has not indulged. But circumstances alter cases; and circumstances have of late bravely altered. The tone and logic of the Saturday Review have altered accordingly. Its issue of 6th of May is a marvellous illustration of the "heigh—presto—change!" Our limits would not permit us to reproduce, even if so inclined, its latest article on "American affairs," and we content ourselves like the Jack Horner of the nursery canticles, with "picking out the plums." Imprimis: "It would have been absurd to expect that the Government of Washington should acquiesce in the secession of a large section of the Federal Republic, merely because coercion was inconsistent with the shallow theories of platforms and school-books. Both parties, disregarding logic, appealed to the decision of force, and the energy of the North has fairly earned a final triumph, but not a right of vengeance." [Who talks vengeance or feels it? Is there such a thing as Justice? "Murder is a crime, arson is a crime, and treason is the greatest of crimes," is the annunciation of a President who knows and feels that heaven-born Mercy may under certain circumstances be, "Not only a crime but a blunder."] "The attempt to divide the Union into two parts would have been not less bitterly resented if the Constitution had expressly reserved the right of secession. The American character is, however, in ordinary times, essentially good-natured, and the attainment of the main object of the war will relax the popular determination to stigmatize as a crime what falls, according to Lord Derby's theory, within the still graver definition of a blunder." [We hope the American character is misrepresented.] "There is, fortunately, no probability that irregular warfare will follow the dissolution or surrender of the principal armies. The Southern States are not well adapted for operations which would in any case be more injurious to the inhabitants than to the Federal troops. It is also to be presumed that the population must be tired of a contest which has involved unprecedented sacrifices, and that submission will be preferred to a purposeless exhibition of dislike." [So all European prophets of evil are to be disappointed, and the Union is to survive even guerrillas! Comforting, truly, but not novel.] "The rapid conclusion of the war has surprised both Americans and foreigners, and it is impossible for the acutest politician to foresee the nature or importance of the political complications which can scarcely fail to ensue; but the termination of domestic discord will happily not involve any risk of collision with foreign Governments." [That depends on how foreign Governments behave themselves.] "The great civil war has proved that a democracy is capable of acting with extraordinary vigor." [That's so! But now comes in the shopkeeper, the fellow who did all he could to help cut your throat, failing in which would like to strike a bargain in trade. Blockade-running being now unprofitable, by all means let us open trade—"Free Trade" is the term, and sounds well. Is it possible that the prospect of an export duty of ten cents per pound on cotton has anything to do with the promulgation of the entirely unselfish advice which follows?] "Its patience," [that of the "democracy" aforesaid] "in the discharge of less exciting duties will be more severely tested by peace. It will be necessary for a considerable period to bear a heavy burden of unaccustomed taxation, and it would obviously be prudent to reduce the protective tariff at least to the point at which, at the expense of the consumer, it would produce the largest amount of revenue. When peace is definitely restored, the pressure of the debt may be considerably diminished by the unobjectionable process of re-borrowing a large portion of the amount at a lower rate of interest." ["Finally, and in conclusion," as profoundly observed by the Ethiopian preacher:] "If the Secretary of the Treasury can tide over two or three years of sudden and violent change, he will find no insuperable difficulty in dealing with a debt which will gradually be lightened by the increase in the resources of the country. Twenty years of prosperity, by doubling the population, will diminish in corresponding proportion the liability of each separate tax-payer. Europeans must endure, as well as they can, the self-satisfaction of a nation which attributes to its character and institutions the results of a boundless territory and of consequently unlimited resources. It will henceforth be impossible to exercise the salutary check on American complacency which has hitherto been imperfectly provided by English criticism." [Yes; it is very likely that "American complacency" will be very little affected in future by foreign, and especially "English criticism." To express it mildly there is a profound contempt for it even now.]

The "representative" or "commissioner," "agent" or "commissary," it is hard to say what he is, whom Mr. Max Hapsburg of Mexico, and styled Emperor of the same by a few Mexican traitors and a considerable body of foreign mercenaries or filibusters, now in that country—this "agent," or what not, is out in the papers with an express and anxious denial that this so-called Emperor has disposed of Sonora and some of the silver States to Louis Napoleon Bonaparte; just as if he had the power to do anything of the sort. These States, we believe, belong to the Mexican Republic; and if Mr. Hapsburg should undertake to dispose of them, he would probably find it difficult to give a valid title, and still more difficult to put the purchaser in possession. We quite credit the disclaimer which Señor Arroyo puts forward on behalf of his "august master," and we have no fears, now, that Sonora will ever become a French colony, or ever materially alter her relations with the Mexican Republic.

NEW BOOKS, MUSIC, &c.

The Art of Painting Photographs in Water-Colors. By Madame Le Pierre. New York: Crawford & Willis.

This appears to be a complete guide, so far as its small size permits, to the manipulation of photograph-coloring. It is evidently the result of practical knowledge.

OUR NATIONAL SECURITIES.

These are represented by Government issues, as follows:

1. The Seven-thirties represent a Currency Loan, having three years to run, then convertible into a Gold Interest 6 ℘ cent. Stock having 20 years to run, but with the right reserved to the Government of paying off the Loan, in Gold, at any time after five years. The term Seven-thirties is derived from the rate of Interest which these three years' convertible notes bear, to wit: two cents per day on each $100, or for 365 days seven dollars and thirty cents on each $100.

2. The term Five-twenties is applied to the 6 ℘ cent. Gold-bearing Bonds of the United States, to which 20 years half-yearly Coupons are attached, but which may be paid off, in Gold, by the Government, on due notice to the holders, at any time after five years, in the not improbable event that the Government should be offered the Money on a new Loan at a cheaper rate than 6 ℘ cent.

3. The term Ten-forties is applied to the 5 ℘ cent. Gold-bearing Bonds of the United States, to which half-yearly Coupons are attached for 40 years, but which may be paid off, in Gold, on notice to the holders, at any time after 10 years, in the possible event the Government should be offered the money on a new Loan at a less rate of Interest than 5 ℘ cent.

4. The Long or unconditional 6 per cent. Gold-bearing Loan, known as the 6 ℘ cents of 1881, cannot be redeemed by the Government at all, except by purchase, until after the year 1881, making this the most desirable of all the United States Loans as a permanent investment.

5. The present outstanding totals of each of the above Loans are as follows:

1—Seven-Thirties	$800,000,000
2—Five-Twenties	596,545,900
3—Ten-Forties	172,770,100
4—Sixes of Eighty-one	281,561,400
Total	$1,650,877,400
Interest in Currency on	$600,000,000
Interest in Gold on	1,050,877,400

In addition to the Gold Interest Stocks here classified, there is outstanding $48,868,891 of the old Funded 5 and 6 per cents of the United States, upon which the Interest is paid in Gold, and the Principal of which will be redeemed in Gold, when due.

6. The terms "Greenbacks" and "Legal-Tender" are convertible. All the Greenbacks are Legal-Tender; but $433,160,569 are of the ordinary circulation free of interest, and $296,000,000 bear simple or compound Interest, payable on the maturity of the Notes, most of them, 6 ℘ cents, payable three years after 1864, the Interest compounded in a table on the back of the Note every six months.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The Washington correspondent of the Springfield Republican has the following remarks on Mr. Stanton's method of dealing with thieves: "There is one good thing that Mr. Stanton is doing at least. He is economising in the public expenditures. Say that he is rude, a boor sometimes, reckless and rash; yet add that he is the terror of thieves. I know this to be true. All the thieves hate Mr. Stanton. I would not say that every man who hates Mr. Stanton is a thief; for that is not true, but it is true that a very large proportion of his enemies are persons who have attempted to get their fingers into the treasury in one way or another, and the ugly Secretary has put his big boots upon them. He is not always fair, that is the worst of it, and occasionally abuses an honest man."

—— The University of Chicago possesses the largest, and it is believed the finest, telescope in the world. Heretofore Harvard College has held that honor, but the "Clarke telescope" of Chicago is to the Harvard as 34 to 21—more than one-half larger. Its cost was $11,187 for the object-glass, and $7,000 for the tube and mounting. The focal length of the telescope is 23 feet.

—— The Richmond correspondent of the London Times, in describing the evacuation of the rebel capital by Jeff. Davis and his supporters, mentions the following incident as occurring at Davis's church, which illustrates how, completely the Virginia chivalry had put under their feet all regard for perishable riches: "It will be believed that the excitement among those who remained was at its highest, but it was remarked by sly observers that the excellent clergymen, who has endeared himself to his congregation by four years of brave and hearty sympathy with their trials, did not omit to make the usual collection—possibly with the design of impressing upon his congregation that nothing unusual had happened—possibly to give credit to a currency from which all felt that every semblance of value was passing away."

—— The Philadelphia Press says: "Both branches of our State Legislature have passed an act declaring that if any employee of a railroad company shall violate any rule of such company, and injury or loss of life shall thereby result, the offender shall be immediately arrested by the prosecuting attorney of the city or county where the accident happened, and if found guilty, shall be convicted of misdemeanor, and punished, at the discretion of the court.

—— Money has been raised in Baltimore to pay counsel to defend the conspirators in the Booth assassination plot.

—— The Rev. Mr. Blanchard, of Brooklyn, has been defending the theatrical profession from the recent attacks made on it in consequence of the Booth murder. The Rev. Mr. Hubbell of the same city rejoins that the theatre is the hot-bed of immorality.

—— The history of the world has nothing like the recent investments in the 7-30's—$30,000,000 were subscribed in one day, and the average for the week has been $13,000,000 a day.

—— The deaths in New York for the week ending May 13th was 460—males, 116; females, 117—boys, 116; girls, 111; a singularly equal distribution of mortality.

—— The opening of the South has already commenced to stir up Northern industry. A house in Springfield has received orders for three cotton presses to be sent to Charleston and Savannah.

—— The Deseret News informs us that when the news of President Lincoln's assassination reached Salt Lake City all business was suspended, the public buildings draped in mourning, and the performances at the theatre were postponed.

—— Barnum offers $500 for the dress in which Jeff. Davis was captured.

—— The Government has resolved to reduce the army to 150,000 men—we have now about 520,000 man in pay.

—— The Queen of England has written a private letter of condolence to Mrs. Lincoln. It is said that she most feelingly alludes to the similarity of their sudden bereavements.

—— The officers of the Mercantile Library Association have raised over $60,000 during the past year towards paying off the debt still owing by that most flourishing and valuable institution. Much of its success is owing to Mr. Bastings Grant, the principal librarian, who has occupied that position from the commencement.

—— The idea has been seized upon by a speculative house of business to have handkerchiefs marked with photographs of the owner. The process "will wash." The idea might be extended upon the knob of an umbrella—it would carry conviction at once, and be patent circumstantial evidence against the purloiner.

—— An order has been issued from the War Department, announcing that all persons found in arms against the United States, east of the Mississippi river, after June 1st, will be considered as guerillas, and punished with death.

—— Gen. Franz Sigel has laid down the sword for the pen, and will henceforth edit the Wrecker, a German paper in Baltimore.

—— The Aries lately captured a blockade-runner off the Florida coast, bound for Nassau, with a 109 bales of cotton on board, $300,000 in specie, and two men not on the crew or passenger list, and who refuse to give their names.

—— A dispatch from Newbern, N. C., says that trains are now running daily on the Wilmington and Weldon Railroad. Trains are also running daily from Morehead City to Raleigh, Salisbury, Charlotte, Danville and Richmond. Gen. Schofield has extended the use of these roads to refugees and rebel soldiers returning to their homes. Union meetings are being held all over the State.

—— The American Numismatic and Archæological Society have in preparation a bronze medal designed to "commemorate the life and perpetuate the name of Abraham Lincoln." It will be three inches in diameter, and will bear on the obverse a bust of the late President and on the reverse an inscription.

—— William Y. Ripley, Esq., of Rutland, Vt., has in his possession an ingeniously contrived torpedo, made to exactly resemble a large lump of coal. This was the artful contrivance employed with so much success by the rebels in blowing up our transports on the Mississippi, and it is suspected that the awful disaster to the Sultana was accomplished by one of these diabolical things. The one in possession of Mr. Ripley was sent to him from Richmond by his son, Brevet Brig.-Gen E. H. Ripley, and was found in the private cabinet of Jefferson Davis after his flight from the city.

—— Gov. Vance has been arrested at the house of his father-in-law, in Buncombe county, N. C. It is said he is to be tried for treason.

—— Mayor Lincoln, of Boston, has refused to sign the order authorizing the opening of the Public Library on Sunday.

—— It is reported that a detachment of cavalry is in pursuit of Gov. Magrath, of South Carolina, who was heard from when about leaving Spartanburg.

—— According to an order from the War Department, the Adjutant-General has been directed to commence mustering honorably out of service all general, field and staff officers who are unemployed, or whose service is no longer needed.

—— A delegation of twenty citizens of North Carolina, invited by President Johnson to confer on the subject of reconstruction, have arrived at Washington. They report the greatest destitution prevailing in the State.

—— The rolls of the officers and enlisted men of Gen. Johnston's rebel army, paroled in North Carolina, have been received at the War Department, in Washington, and comprise a list of 37,000 names. This, of course, does not include those rebel soldiers who deserted their organization on learning of their surrender to Gen. Sherman, without waiting for the form of paroling.

Personal.—Marquis Montholon, the new French Minister, was formally introduced to the President on the 13th of May. They mutually expressed the friendliest feelings.

—— Gen. Warren has been appointed by Gen. Grant to the command of the Department of the Mississippi.

—— Among the persons captured with Jeff Davis was Benton N. Harrison, his private secretary. He is a native of Mississippi, and was educated in Yale College. Till 1861 he had always been considered a strong Union man.

—— Robert Lincoln will resign his commission in the army, and will enter upon the practice of the law at Chicago.

—— "Five years ago," says the Philadelphia Enquirer, "Andrew Johnson voted for John C. Breckenridge for President. Now, Andrew Johnson is President himself, and will hang Breckenridge, if he can catch him."

—— Mrs. Julia Dean Hayne is now performing in Oregon. She was not very successful in California.

—— Gen. Lee is busy in Richmond upon a history of his four years rebel campaign.

—— George D. Prentice, of the Louisville Journal, is lying very sick at Nashville. Clarence Prentice, his son, late in the rebel service, has taken the oath of allegiance to the Federal Government.

—— Miss Laura Barrie, the young American cantatrice, has made a great hit in London. The critics all speak of her as one of the most promising young artists they have heard.

Foreign.—The luxury now prevalent in Paris in the article of dress was brilliantly apparent lately at two balls, one given at the Grand Hotel, for the benefit of the British Charitable Fund, established in Paris, in 1822, the other at the British Embassy. The toilettes at the latter were of the most magnificent description. But reckless prodigality in dress is not confined to that worn in public. A leading house at the Boulevards has lately executed an order for 10 pairs of sheets, the same number of pillow-cases, and 12 night-chemises, the total cost of which, by reason of the lace and embroidery used, amounted to 32,800 francs. A married lady who saw the articles, and, perhaps rather indiscretely, inquired who was the object of this monstrous extravagance, received the following answer, which I will not attempt to translate: "Hélas! Madame; ce n'est pas pour une de vos égales—l'Hymen ne se couche pas dans des draps pareils."

—— At length the light of veracious official statistics has been thrown on the losses sustained by the French army during a portion of the Crimean war. Dr. Chenu, Physician-in-Chief to the army, has just sent his official medical report to the Government, by whom it is published. Here are the figures; they apply to the period between April 1 and Dec. 31, 1857, inclusive: Killed on the field of battle, or missing, 10,240; lost in the Semilante, 702; died of cold and apoplexy, 4,342; of various diseases, 8,084; died on the field, or in hospitals, 72,247; total, 95,615. It will be seen that the mortality from the effects of the disease and climate is very high.

—— At one of the last sittings of the Court of Assizes, Paris, the President made the following observation: "I see here several advocates with trousers of various colors. For to-day it is well, but henceforth the practice must be discontinued.

—— Arsenic is prescribed by Homœopathists for those attacked by the new Russian epidemic.

—— The Paris Presse states that the Pirate Admiral Semmes has arrived at Havre.

—— Madame Ludwika Lesniowska, editress of the Polish journal, the News of the World, has just been liberated by the Austrian Government, after having passed three months in prison for an offence against the laws of the press.

—— The French Government has received official information that the land cultivated with cotton in the province of Bona, Algeria, has increased within two years from 150 to 1,250 acres; 942 quintals of raw cotton were sent from that province to France previous to the 14th of March in the present year.

—— It is said that the Empress of France, instead of writing the life of Marie Antoinette, is deeply engaged in preparing for a revival of the classic and clinging style of drapery which ignores crinoline.

RECEPTION OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC AT RICHMOND, VA., MAY 9TH.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN, NEW BUILDING.—GRAND HALL AND STAIRWAY.

LIGHTHOUSE.

Marblehead, Massachusetts.

BY BEN. BURLEIGH STANTON.

WHERE break with angry motion,
The foam-crown'd waves of ocean
On the rocks of Marblehead,
Stands the Lighthouse, white and dreary,
Sadly, lonely, and as weary
As the tombstone on the dead!

Where the white-winged snow-gulls clatter
Along the coast, and shatter
The ice-fields into foam,
Still it stands there: ever throwing
Light to guide the sailor going
In before the storm.

In the tranquil nights of summer,
When all earth is wrapt in slumber,
As the shroud around the dead—
Still it stands there: ever watching
For the fishermen, approaching
The shores of Marblehead.

Though 'tis ever full of sadness,
And though ne'er a ray of gladness
Ever falls upon that shore,
Yet we love, above to wander,
By that Lighthouse, and to ponder
On the dear ones gone before.

Yes, it stands there, ever keeping
Watch above the sailors, sleeping
'Neath the waves on ocean's bed;
'Tis the tombstone of the sailors,
Who are resting from their labors
Till the sea gives up its dead.

CHECK-MATE:

A SKETCH FROM LIFE.

BY CHARLES D. GARDETTE.

CHAPTER I.

Two persons, a lady and a gentleman, sat together in a lawyer's office one morning, not very long ago, in earnest consultation. The gentleman, who was a young man of some six or eight-and-twenty, and the legal occupant of the office, announced himself upon the customary sign on the window as "Maurice Dace, Attorney-at-Law." The lady, some three or four years his senior, was his sister, Mrs. Bullen.

"It is a very strange affair, Maria," said the young lawyer; "in fact, scarcely conceivable——"

"But true, Maurice," interrupted his sister, earnestly. "I need to know Grace well when I lived in Grandville, and always thought her the victim of her brother's and sister's tyranny, though she never complained, poor child, unless a sort of appealing timidity and melancholy in her manner could be construed into a mute complaint. But that they would or could even carry that tyranny to such a horrible pitch of wickedness I never dreamt. How can such things be done with impunity in a country and age like this?"

"It is certainly a heinous piece of villainy, if true," said Maurice, musingly. Then, rousing himself and speaking with energy, "And it shall be sifted to the bottom, I swear to you, Maria. Give me the letter again. You must leave it with me. I may find it of use."

"And I will find means to let Grace know that her cause is undertaken by one who will pursue it to the one without faltering," said Mrs. Bullen, joyfully, at the same time rising. And having handed him the letter referred to, she left the office.

The young man read the letter over once more. Thus it ran:

"Dr. Mantouffel's Private Asylum,
Yew street,

"DEAR, DEAR MRS. BULLEN—If you remember Grace Forster with any affection, oh, have pity upon her and come to her assistance now. I—that is, Grace—have been imprisoned in this horrible place for two whole years by the—by my brother, who obtained a physician's certificate that I was insane. Do no believe it, dear Mrs. Bullen. He did this terrible thing to get my fortune, of which he was administrator. I am, and have ever been perfectly sane, though nearly driven mad at times, God knows, by the treatment I have suffered. I cannot explain here, having to write this by stealth, how I have been thus sequestered successfully so long; but if you will apply to see me as a friend of my brother's perhaps they will let me see you. I have written you six times before, but have never been able to get the letter out of the house; perhaps this even will not go. But I wish and beseech you, dear Mrs. Bullen, whether you are permitted to visit me or not, to apply to some honorable and experienced lawyer, on my behalf, immediately, and to show him this, in which I hereby solemnly promise to pay him ten thousand dollars upon his setting me legally at liberty, and putting me in possession of my fortune. Once more, do not forsake me, I beseech you, for you are my last and only hope.

"IT IS TERRIBLE, TERRIBLE! DEAR MAURICE!"

"GRACE FORSTER."

"It cannot be!" murmured Maurice. "And yet—yet it must be. There is no madness there. Ten thousand dollars! Pshaw! It is not the money that moves me, I swear! But how shall I—— Ha! I have it! A bold, a very bold move; but, if it succeed, a check-mate at once, and even if it fail the law is left. It shall go hard but I pluck this dark deed into light somehow."

He called his office boy, and telling him he was going out of town for a few days, bade him lock-up the rooms and go home. Then stepping into his bedchamber, which adjoined the office—he was a bachelor, and lived en garçon—he filled a small portmanteau with toilet necessaries, and in less than an hour was rattling over the rails towards the metropolis of Grandville.

INTERVIEW BETWEEN STEPHEN FORSTER AND THE LAWYER.

CHAPTER II.

STEPHEN FORSTER sate smoking a mild havana in his cosy library, which was a quiet room in the rear of the house, looking upon a small but well-appointed garden (for he dwelt in the suburbs of the city), with a few fine trees, and a summer pavilion in the centre.

In spite of the soothing influence of the weed, however, his brow was clouded and his eye troubled. He held a letter in his hand.

"Manteuffel is a fool, or rather knave," muttered he. "It is not likely that I am going to be thwarted now, after all the trouble I have had to succeed. D——nation! why didn't my father make a will? I was his favorite. He would certainly have left the bulk of his estate to me, and I should have had half a million at least, instead of a mere third. Curse the law of this 'free country!' The idea of dividing the father's fortune equally—equally—between his children, without regard to age or sex, just because he made no will. However, they made me administrator, and though Sarah was married, and I had to pay over her portion, I have taken good care of Grace's. Ha! ha! ha! That idea of insanity was a splendid dodge, though it has cost me dear! Nearly ten thousand dollars, by heaven! It's lucky that Sarah's husband has taken her abroad to live. I shouldn't have been able to accomplish it, perhaps, if they'd been here. Not that Sarah would have said anything probably; she hated Grace as much as I did, I believe, but her husband was one of your prying, preaching fellows. And it's luckier still that Henkins went into the army as surgeon and was gobbled up by the rebels; he was always threatening to peach, if I didn't give him more money for that certificate. And yet everybody thought him a respectable physician, the rascal! But now comes this cursed Dutch doctor, and writes me that he 'feels assured that Miss Forster has recovered her reason sufficiently to bear removal,' and 'recommends that I take her under my protection again.' He is getting frightened, that's what's the matter—or rather, he wants to extort more money. Yes, that's it! Curse him! I'll—no I won't; I'll run down and see him to-morrow, and if he isn't reasonable, I'll find another 'retreat' for Grace. That won't be very difficult, I fancy, with the proofs I have of her—— Who's there?"

"There's a gentleman wishes to see you, sir," said the servant, opening the door at which he had just knocked.

"A gentleman? What's his name?"

"I don't know, sir; here's his card."

"Maurice Dace; Dace? humph! Don't know him. Well, ask him to step in, Joseph. Wants me to subscribe to something, I suppose. Sanitary commission, or something. I've given all I intend to, and I'll be—— Good afternoon, sir. Pray, to what am I indebted for the honor of your visit? Will—ahem!" (perceiving that the stranger was undoubtedly a gentleman) "will you take a seat, sir?"

"I have the honor to address Mr. Stephen Forster, I believe?" said Mr. Dace, seating himself, but keeping his eyes fixed upon the countenance of his host.

"Certainly, that is my name, Mr.——Dace."

"I have called upon you, Mr. Forster, on behalf of my client, Miss Grace Forster, your younger sister, and joint heritrix, with your elder sister and yourself, in the estate of your father, John Forster, deceased," said Maurice, speaking with emphasis.

As he spoke, Forster started, flushed and grew pale; but mastering his emotion, waited in silence until he concluded. Then, coldly:

"Indeed! And may I ask what business my poor sister Grace, who has for more than two years been bereft of her reason, alas! can have with me, her brother and natural guardian, in which the intervention of a—an attorney, as I suppose you to be, is necessary?"

"I am, as you conjecture, an attorney, Mr. Forster, and in that capacity am retained by your sister, who is, and has always been, in full possession of her reason, with instructions—in case milder means fail—to bring suit against you for false imprisonment, perjury, and conspiracy to defraud her of her portion of her father's estate, of which, by decision of court, she was, and is entitled to one full third, the said father having died intestate."

During this sentence, which Maurice delivered calmly, and with legal distinctness, Mr. Forster's feelings, spite of himself, worked fiercely. As the lawyer uttered the last word, the other sprang from his seat, and pacing up and down the room, with heavy footsteps, exclaimed:

"What, sir! What do you mean, sir, by thus coming to insult me in my own house—to—to—to accuse me—me—of perjury, of conspiring against my own sister—my—my——"

Again he made a violent effort, and succeeded in recovering an external calmness; for violence, he foresaw, would avail him nothing, and might betray him. He reseated himself, and resumed:

"You will oblige me, sir, by instantly explaining your motive in thus daring to intrude upon me with an absurd and insulting story of—of— In short, sir, if, as I presume, your object in threatening me with a suit, based upon the wild wanderings of our unfortunate lunatic—for upon some communication, direct or indirect, from the crazed brain of my poor sister, I must suppose your scheme based—if your object, I repeat, is to extort money from me, allow me to tell you, sir——"

"Stop! Mr. Forster!" interrupted Maurice, peremptorily. "You are wasting words and feelings worse than idly. Let us be reasonable a few moments, and listen to me, calmly. I desire no money from you. What I do desire, and mark me, sir, what I mean to have, is justice! Justice to your innocent victim—to your sister! Whether that justice is to be obtained without public infamy to yourself, remains with you alone! Here is my case, and my proposal, from which nothing shall make me deviate a hair's breadth! I am in possession of proofs of what I advance. Namely: That upon your father's death, and the consequent division of his property, you began a deliberate system of persecution of your sister Grace, then under your tutelage, and of tender age. That the result of that treatment was to render the child gradually timid, silent and melancholy; that as she grew into womanhood, this melancholy became more fixed, and that her state of mind and and actions suggested to you a plan by which you could obtain possession of her portion of your father's estate. That you followed this devilish suggestion with success. That you suborned a physician to give a certificate of lunacy, swore to your sister's mania before the court, and obtained thus fraudulently the authority to immure her and take the exclusive guardianship of her person and property. That, further, you caused, by equally villainous means, your sister to undergo such so-called medical treatment, while in the asylum where she was placed, by you, as in your hope, would actually accomplish the mental ruin you had sworn to have already taken place. And finally, that you have, during her seclusion, made use of the interest of her property for your own benefit, and virtually made yourself the possessor and beneficiary of her whole estate."

Here Maurice paused for a double object—to take breath, and to observe the effect of his accusation upon Forster.

The lawyer had, as he had said in his office, made a very bold move. He had, in fact, assumed the legal proofs to exist of the villainy as he detailed it; his legal acumen and the information he had been able hastily and secretly to gather, giving him the clue to the whole probable course of the conspiracy. But these legal proofs he was, as yet, wholly without, and it remained to be seen whether the moral weight of his accusation as he had boldly made it, would terrify the man into performing the act of justice demanded of him, without daring the open infamy and punishment that a public trial would, in case of conviction, entail upon him. So he waited a moment.

But Forster sat breathing hard, and evidently unable to control his thoughts sufficiently to make a decided answer at the instant, or perhaps unwilling to hazard one till he had heard all.

"Now for my proposal," resumed Maurice. "I am authorized to say, that if you will at once, by the proper means, free your sister—Miss Grace Forster—from restraint, and have her full restoration—restoration, do you hear, sir? she spares you by that word—a reason properly certified and legally established; and if you will, as speedily thereafter as may be, restore to her the undiminished principal of her estate, being one full third of that left by her father, she will take no proceedings whatever against you for the past; she will bind herself not to mention it, even in her future intercourse with the world, and she will overlook and forgive you all and any sums arising from her property in the way of back interest and income, for which you stand her debtor. This is all I am empowered to say, sir. I await your decision."

For full five minutes the two men sat facing each other in silence. Maurice's face was calm and impenetrable, while his eye never for an instant lost sight of the varying emotions that played over the agitated countenance of the guilty brother. At length Forster drew a deep breath, passed his hand over his brow, and said in a low, hoarse voice, which he strove in vain to render clear:

"The strange, the outrageous accusation of which you are the vehicle, sir, has so astounded me, that I am utterly unable to look at it and reply to it as I ought. It is, however, thank heaven! of little importance now, and I shall school myself to look upon it as a dream which never had a firmer foundation than a fancy of my dear sister's formerly diseased imagination. I—do not, I beg of you, interrupt me, sir—a moment's patience only, (for Maurice was going to make an indignant rejoinder). By one of those coincidences that so often fix superstition, I had a few moments before your arrival, received a letter from the—from Dr. Manteuffel—in whose care poor Grace has been for about two years, giving me the joyful intelligence of her complete restoration, and advising her withdrawal from restraint. Do you doubt me, sir? You do me wrong. Here is the letter; read it, examine the postmark, the date—satisfy yourself."

Maurice, wonderingly took the letter, and looked it quickly over. "Hypocrite!" he muttered to himself, as he handed it back with a gesture of assent.

"Thus, sir," continued Forster, "you see that this very painful scene might have been spared, had I believed for a moment it would turn out to be other than a mere attempt—pardon me, sir—to levy black mail, by an audaciously concocted—but no matter! You have been deceived, but only in listening to the last lingerings of my sister's folly. A few days later, and she would have undeceived you——"

"Mr. Forster," interrupted Maurice, sternly, "if you fancy, sir, that I am to——"

"Well! well!" exclaimed Forster, quickly, "let us speak no more of what is past, let us forget it, I beg! If you have no objection, I will accompany you to-morrow to ——, and will, in conjunction with yourself as my sister's counsel, take immediate and proper means to release her, and reinstate her in her social position and fortune. I assure you, sir, I shall do this with unfeigned——"

"I will meet you at the railway, sir," said Maurice, coldly, cutting him short. "Good evening!"

And so, with a formal face, but a joyful heart, the young man left the house of the baffled brother.

"Can it be—can it possibly be, after all, that we—that Maria and I were mistaken—and that Miss Forster was really——? But no, no! The man is a double-dyed hypocrite and scoundrel, that's all!" And arriving at this conclusion, Dace went to bed and slept sweetly upon it.

CHAPTER III.

"WELL, Maria, are you not satisfied?" asked Maurice, as they sat together in Mrs. Bullen's dining-room, one evening, a week after the interview described just above.

"I am indeed, and exceedingly rejoiced for poor Grace's sake! And, Maurice, I'll tell you what," added she, as if struck with a brilliant idea, "there's only one thing more you ought to do, to complete your good work!"

"One thing more? Why, I think my part of the business is happily over. Miss Forster is set at liberty, her sanity thoroughly established, and her fortune in process of being restored to her. She has been of legal age several months, is her own mistress, and worth nearly a quarter of a million. Upon my word I don't see—perhaps you mean that I ought to bring her brother to punishment? But you know, Miss Foster expressly—"

"No! I don't mean that, though I really think we are all almost guilty in not unmasking that bad man, and if it was not poor Grace's urgent entreaties, I certainly should let my friends know, at any rate—however, I don't refer to him now, but to you and Grace."

"What can you mean, my dear Maria? I've done everything it was my duty to do."

"Oh! duty! no doubt you have, Maurice, but —well, I won't plague you. I mean you ought—to—marry her!"

Maurice sprang up, as if a hornet had suddenly stung him!

"What an utterly absurd idea!" cried he.

"Not the least absurd!" retorted his sister, "Sit down, and listen to me. Grace is free, Grace is sane, Grace is rich. True! thanks to you! But Grace is timid, Grace is alone, Grace is unprotected. Give her strength, courage, protection, by giving her a husband! You needn't look vexed, nor shake your head. Grace is filled with enthusiastic gratitude towards you. She regards you as her champion and defender, she is exactly in the condition of feeling, to fall earnestly in love with you. Moreover, she is amiable, pretty, pure-hearted, intelligent and thoroughly good. She is worthy of you, and I will say it to your face, you are worthy of her! And finally, sir, she is at this very moment waiting in the parlor to see you on 'particular business,' having requested me to send for you half an hour ago, as she wished to ask you further counsel before leaving us, which she insists upon doing to-morrow morning, from some ridiculous notion of giving me trouble by being longer my guest."

"Ah!—I—she really ought not to leave you; at least not so soon!" exclaimed Maurice, hastily. "Her brother may—or at least her property is not yet—"

"Exactly!" said his sister, smiling. "So go, now, and convince her that she should not leave. She will listen to you."

"But, Maria—"

"But, Maurice! Go, I tell you. Will you keep a lady waiting, sir?"

And Maurice went.

CHAPTER IV.

SIX months have passed since Grace Forster waited for Maurice Dace in Mrs. Bullon's parlor, and there she sits once more with the young lawyer by her side. Her melancholy has certainly fled, for she is smiling sweetly, and her timidity, too, is gone, for Maurice holds one of her little hands in his, and she does not withdraw it; his arm is round her waist, yet she does not shrink from him. Truly she should not, for she is no longer Grace Forster the victim, and his client, but Mrs. Maurice Dace, his beloved wife! They have been married a fortnight! Yet there is a sadness about her, too, and she shudders, as she says, in a low voice:

"It is terrible, terrible! dear Maurice! And yet I scarcely know how to grieve as I ought!"

And Maurice presses her closer, and kisses her brow, and whispers:

"Let it pass, dearest! Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof!"

What mean they? Alas! Stephen Forster is before his Judge! He has perished by his own hand!

LAMARTINE AND DUMAS.

POOR M. de Lamartine has come before us again as a borrower. It is distressing. I never think of him without considering Death as man's best friend: for, had the dusky angel borne him away to the ebony chambers amid the turmoil of 1848, what a grand position would De Lamartine have for all time occupied in French history! The literary hack, and the lamenter, and the beggar would not have darkened the splendid scene. I cannot find it in my heart to blame M. de Lamartine. I pity him. I am grieved. I blame Death for playing the churl, and pushing himself into so many abodes of prosperity and happiness to snatch loved ones from cradle and bed, when he might heighten the glory of an immortal genius, and ease an aching heart by bearing the poet to his soft bed. The new loan is to be for $30,000 in the shape of $40 bonds, carrying 5 per cent. interest, payable in the sum of $50, and extinguished annually by drawing and paying a given number. His estates will be mortgaged to secure the bondholders. I am afraid it may not be successful. If the Athenians were tired of hearing Aristides called the Just, what would have been their fatigue had they so often heard him called the money-borrower? The poor man has published also this advertisement: "Reduction of price; 120f. off. Complete Works of Lamartine. M. de Lamartine, constrained by unexpected circumstances to prompt payments, is obliged to offer to the public the remaining 450 remaining copies of his complete works, with a reduction of 120f. a copy. Time given for payment. Address M. de Lamartine 43 Rue de la Ville l'Evêque, for all demands at the rate of 200f. the copy." This sale, he hopes, may bring him 54,000f.

Shall I say, too, poor M. Alex. Dumas? He raises our smiles. In the theatres, in other public places, and in society, he is forward, easy to impudence, and not without something like swagger. He has taken to lecturing to procure money. He bounces to his chair, swallows glass after glass of sugared water, before he can float up his voice to an audible pitch; then he buries his nose in his manuscript, and, without raising his head once, reads—reads—reads—as if the happiest moment of his life would be that in which "The End" was reached. And what do you think is the subject of his lecture? The history of France in the reign of Henry II.! Can't you see us shaking with laughter?—Paris Letter.

No doubt a lady may be expected to make a great noise in the world when her dress is covered all over with bugles

THE CREATION OF MAN.

(FROM THE GREEK.)

Before the beginning of years
  There came to the making of man
Time, with a gift of tears;
  Grief, with a glass that ran;
Pleasure, with pain for leaven;
  Summer, with flowers that fell;
Remembrance fallen from heaven,
  And madness risen from hell;
Strength without hands to smite;
  Love that endures for a breath;
Night, the shadow of light,
  And life, the shadow of death.

And the high gods took in hand
  Fire, and the falling of tears,
And a measure of sliding sand
  From under the feet of the years;
And froth and drift of the sea;
  And dust of the laboring earth;
And bodies of things to be
  In the houses of death and of birth;
And wrought with weeping and laughter,
  And fashioned with loathing and love,
With life before and after,
  And death beneath and above,
For a day and a night and a morrow,
  That his strength might endure for a span
With travail and heavy sorrow,
  The holy spirit of man.
From the winds of the north and the south
  They gathered us unto strife;
They breathed upon his mouth,
  They filled his body with life;
Eyesight and speech they wrought
  For the veils of the soul therein,
A time for labor and thought,
  A time to serve and to sin;
They gave him light in his ways,
  And love, and a space for delight,
And beauty and length of days,
  And night, and sleep in the night.
His speech is a burning fire;
  With his lips he travaileth;
In his heart is a blind desire,
  In his eyes foreknowledge of death;
He weaves, and is clothed with derision;
  Sows, and he shall not reap;
His life is a watch or a vision
  Between a sleep and a sleep.

GUY'S FOLLY;

OR,

The Secret of Thornton Heath.

BY VANE IRETON ST. JOHN.

AUTHOR OF "THE LASS OF RICHMOND HILL," "THE WORLD'S VERDICT," ETC.

CHAPTER VIII.—MARY WINTER.

ON rushing away across the moor from the cottage of Mrs. Freshfield, Ralph St. Clare went straight towards his own home.

This home and its inmates I must describe.

It was a little cottage, situated about a mile west of Thornton Heath, and nestling in a perfect forest of verdure.

Lying a little below the level of the road, you could look down upon crowded parterres of flowers, and tiny beds between, and green turf plots, and pretty meandering paths.

The cottage had white walls, and borderings of stained wood, and little windows of all imaginable shapes, with small diamond-shaped panes.

The inmates were four: Ralph St. Clare, his mother, his cousin, Mary Winter, and a servant-maid.

Mary Winter was a pretty girl, with dark hazel eyes and brown hair, and a sweet mouth, a figure of excellent grace, and a voice melodious and low.

There was no mistake as to her being beautiful and attractive, and there was less mistake about her heart.

She was gentle-hearted, good-natured, kind to every one; not one of your passive tempers, be it said, but one who knew well the proper dignity of woman.

Mrs. St. Clare herself, who had adopted this girl when quite a child, was a quiet woman, who took life very easy, floating along life's stream indeed, much like a fallen tree riding on the bosom of a river, rebounding against rocks and falling over precipices, but always floating out again without injury or concern into mid-water.

Mary Winter was seated in the bow window overlooking the front garden when Ralph St. Clare entered the room, pale and agitated.

He did not observe her, but walked straight to the fireplace and sat down, burying his face in his hands.

"What is the matter, Ralph?" asked the gentle voice, as the gentle eyes beamed over upon him.

He started at the sound, and looked up almost savagely.

He had recognised the sound only, not the voice. He softened down at once on seeing Mary Winter.

"Is that you, Mary, dear?" he said. "Why what are you doing up at this time of night?"

"Waiting for you, Ralph."

"Waiting for me! Why, I might have been out half the night."

She rose, and, crossing the room, sat down beside him.

"You are in grief, Ralph," she said. "Tell me what it is?"

He looked at her half-angrily.

"I am only ill. I have a headache, and don't want to talk."

Mary was astonished. She had never seen him in such a mood before.

"Why, Ralph, dear, what can ail you?" she said. "Surely you are not angry with me, who have never given cause for anger?"

She slid her arm around his neck as she spoke. She had been used to do this for years; she loved him so dearly, and saw in all his actions such evidences of affection that she considered him as her affianced husband, although the actual offer had never been made.

Her words and manner roused him to a sense of injustice.

"Dear Mary," he said, kissing her fondly, "you must, indeed, exercise my behavior to-night. I have had a disappointment, and it has upset me."

"What is it?"

"I have lost the chance of a large sum of money," paused Ralph. "I had expected, besides, a great favor from a friend to-night, and I have been disappointed in both. Upon these two chances my best hopes were set, and it has almost destroyed my faith in human kindness, Mary—indeed it has."

Mary's tears started to her eyes.

"Not in mine?"

"No, my own, Mary. You are always good, and kind, and loving."

He rose suddenly.

"Good-night, Mary," he said. "I am going away early in the morning."

"Going away?"

"Yes; to London."

"What for?"

"On business. I shall not be gone long; so do not fret. Good-night. Heaven bless you, Mary!"

He stooped over her and kissed her lips.

Oh, how that kiss thrilled through every nerve of her body.

"Good-night, Ralph," she murmured. "I am very sorry—very sorry, indeed, you are going away; but I am sure while you are away you will not forget me?"

"Forget you? Never, dear Mary."

Those words were her companions that night—sweet companions—bringing honeyed visions to her mind, over which had been always her starring-points of happiness.

And as she passed along the corridor, with her lamp borne by the red-room, she met Ralph walking towards his.

He did not see her, but she heard him murmur as he went by:

"Oh! how I love her!"

The next morning he was gone.

Yet Mary was not unhappy.

The last words and the last kiss were still impressed so fully on her mind, that she had no room for unhappiness.

Meanwhile, Ralph St. Clare did not go at once to London.

He made his appearance at Bevan's, and after various unsuccessful evenings, suddenly disappeared.

Gideon Crawleigh had, as I have said, marked him as his special victim; and as Ralph was a novice in gaming, he soon entered the snare laid.

Ralph St. Clare left Bevan's ruined—as far as a poor man can be ruined—on the very same evening that Gideon Crawleigh, resplendent in his black cloth coat and white choker, made his appearance at Raymond Park.

Guy Raymond was seated in his old study, very quiet and pale, with his arm in a sling, when Gideon entered.

He bowed, however, with his usual courtesy.

"Good evening, Mr. Crawleigh," he said—"good evening. Have you brought me any news?"

Gideon took the chair to which the miser motioned him.

"I have news, such as it is. In the first case I fear your suspicions are correct."

"As to what?"

"As to your nephew's guilt. He has had large sums of money lately, and has wasted them on shameful extravagances—gambling and other things."

The miser's brief face flushed.

"And where is he now? he asked.

"He has fled to London."

"Gone—another sin," muttered Guy Raymond. "Better that he should avoid my anger, than bring disgrace on all connected with him. You did not attempt to stay his flight," he added, aloud.

"I did not. Why should I? had not your order to do so?"

"True—true."

He mused awhile.

Gideon, who saw that he had relapsed into one of his endless fits of abstraction spoke again.

"Is there another, sir," muttered Guy Raymond? he said.

The miser made a clutching movement with his hand, as if to grasp and secure the money which Gideon Crawleigh was proposing to rob him of.

Then, with a sigh, he rose and quitted the room.

This was the moment for which Gideon Crawleigh watched.

No sooner had Guy Raymond's step grown fainter and fainter, and faded away, than Gideon sprung up, and rushing to the window, unlocked it.

The snap flew back easily, and the curtains were rearranged as before when the old miser returned.

"Here, are ten pounds, Mr. Crawleigh," he said. "Give them, and make good use of them. Gold is not found every day."

Gideon smiled, placed them in his pocket, and in a few minutes he was making his way hurriedly towards Walter Raymond's house.

It was with some surprise that Walter greeted him, for the look of pleasure upon Guy's face was quite unusual.

"Have you good news," he asked, that you come here with such a smiling countenance?"

"I have."

"Of what kind?"

"I bring you the news that this very night we can enter Guy's Folly without fear, for I have arranged our entrance."

Walter turned pale

"The risk is great," he said.

"There is no risk at all," returned Gideon. "I have left the door of the study open. In his desk there he keeps all his bank-notes. Step—I anticipate your objection. If he has the numbers, I know where to dispose of the notes without fear of detection."

Walter paced the room agitatedly.

"I fear I cannot go," he said. "I did not like the other business; this time I dislike it more."

"What have you to fear?"

"Discovery, which means everything—ruin, disgrace—even death."

"Pooh, pooh! You have the times because, like me, you have no money. Really I am in sad straits, indeed, this trial must be made to-night."

"Then go alone."

"I cannot."

"Well, I, at least, will not accompany you. Command either of your friends to go with you."

Gideon started.

This resolution on Walter's part did not in any way suit his plans.

"You refuse?" he cried.

"Yes."

"And ask me to choose another friend to go with me?"

"Yes."

"Are you mad? Do you want the whole neighborhood let into our secrets? Do you want me to put you and myself in the power of some fellow, who at any moment can betray us? No; if you are thus insensate, I at least, am prudent. You and I must be the sole repositories of this scene."

Still Walter was resolute.

"Let it remain so, then," he said. "But you must go alone. Keep the produce of the robbery entirely yourself, if you please, but do not expect any assistance from me."

Gideon put his hip in anger.

"And pray, may I ask the cause of this strange resolution?"

Walter lowered his voice.

"I will," he said. "When I married my wife, you know I loved her?"

"Yes; I believe so; else you were a fool for doing so, for she brought you nothing."

Walter was seizing now indeed.

"You mistake, sir," he said, "she brought me happiness. Well, now, I fear, much as she loved me once, she is beginning to suspect me. She has taken a dislike to Ralph St. Clare, and seeks that on the very night of our mysterious journey the theft was committed and my pockets full, she has connected the two and implicated me. Another such affair, and I lose her love at once and for ever."

"Better that than lose it gradually—wearing it away in the long, slow years of poverty."

"Poverty! that is not the necessary result. I must work; better that than disgraceful wealth and the loss of my wife's love."

Gideon stamped impatiently.

"Will you not do it for friendship—for the sake of my friendship?"

"I begin to doubt it."

"Why?"

"Because your advice is bad, and you will not listen to my wishes for reformation."

"Your wishes! my friend—my friend! You have given me the right to command."

"The right to command?"

"Yes; and I will use it for your own good. Either you consent to do as I wish, or I go this moment to your wife and tell her all."

Walter grew ashy pale.

"You cannot be so cruel—so selfishly cruel?"

Gideon moved towards the door.

"I will do it—I swear it. Rather than suffer you and myself to lapse into utter poverty, I will give this moment."

He was at the door ere Walter stopped him.

Then the man who was deluded by a wrong sense of love, dropped into a chair, and said, gasp ingly:

"Stay, stay, I will go with you, but tell her not, tell her not."

Gideon resumed his seat with a smile, and as was always the case with him, said no more of his disinclination.

The only allusion, in fact, that he made to the subject of his visit was that as he meet the 9.40 Greenbury, I shall be here at the usual hour or, better still, meet me at the 'Greyhound' at eleven, that your wife may not know you are with me."

CHAPTER IX.—"IT WAS A SKELETON; YES A LIVING ONE."

LADY ARDUTHNOT'S house—as it was called by every one, for Sir Arthur was locked upon as a mere cipher—had a quiet and retired look at the back, of which no one knew the use.

Every servant in the place was aware that Lady Arduthnot visited that red-house twice a day; but as she kept the key, and there was no window, no one knew what it contained.

It was a small place, built of brick, and leaned, as it were, against the wall of the stable; but there was no communication between the two, and if living; for the stablemen swore positively to the servants' hall that no sounds emanated from it.

Out of the house no one had heard of the circumstance.

Once she had found one of her servants tattling in the vicinity. She had discharged the girl at once with a warning together the others, she told them distinctly that similar conduct on the part of any one of them would be visited with similar punishment.

"My affairs are my own," she said; "it is unnecessary for my servants to discuss them, or speak of them abroad."

The consequence was, that the servants did discuss them; but there was no more chattering away from home.

About four days after the second robbery at Guy's Folly—for Walter Raymond and Gideon Crawleigh succeeded beyond their hopes—Lady Arbuthnot took her way from her drawing-room, and crossing the stable-yard, entered the little out-house.

Let us follow her.

The out-house, when she had entered it, presented to view a bareness of two doors, carefully covered with green baize, and padded with leather, so as to exclude all air and sound.

On passing through these, you entered a little room, warm, but subdued by a light of day.

A little room, ventilated in a strange manner; for the air had to penetrate through corded fantastic, which draped like the out ceilings of Mexico.

By a fire in a corner of the room sat an old man.

A skeleton, truly, yet a living one; with hollows sunk above hollow cheeks; and a forehead which looked like bone; and a mouth like the unfleshed lips of a skull; and long, shiny fingers; and a thin, wasted form.

The eye alone seemed to proclaim that life resided in this attenuated, wasted body; and these eyes, dewed of expression as they were, were now lighted with delight as Lady Arduthnot as she entered.

The room was square now and dreary; its furniture consisted of a table, a bed, two chairs, a washing-stand, a carpet, and that was all.

The walls were of the plainest kind, and had seemed once dingy and miserable enough.

Now they were very different; for on all sides a hideously-executed set of ornamentation met your eye in the form of pictures of every sort, shape and size, pasted on the walls.

There were pictures of kings, empresses, and kings and queens, and princes and princesses, and harlequins and clowns, and columbines and ballet-girls of all kinds; there were accurately-painted sultans and rajahs, chimney-sweeps and disconsolate maidens, heads of heathen clipped from old books, Popes, and Jews, and Turks, and wild, heavy soldiers, very stiff and fierce; scenes from theatres, operas and tragedies, strangely mingled together.

This was the only amusement for the poor prisoner, and he loved it dearly.

For years now he had been immured in this solitary dungeon.

Gideon was very lonely, for none knew that he was there, and none therefore visited him.

His story was a strange one.

An early life he had married a girl whom he loved dearly.

He had known her from a child—had been brought up with her and loved her; and the boyish admiration when he became a man was warmed into love and passion by the contemplation of her glorious form.

They were married when very young, and despite her Indian, where for some time they lived happily.

When business called him to England, on arriving there he found that his wife, during his absence, his uncle—to whom he was heir—had become created a baronet, and had died, leaving him a fortune and a title.

After disposing of his business he wrote to his wife, acquainting her with the joyful news, and requesting her to come to England at once.

He received no answer.

Again and again he wrote with the same result; and at length he heard that the terrible news that his wife was dead, and his child also.

During his stay in England he remained at the house of his uncle, where he met a woman whom he had never seen for years, but who once had been a friend, and to be possessed with a great partiality for him.

This woman—a dark-browned, haughty beauty of fifty-and-more, was the wife of Sir Arthur Arbuthnot, the country residence of the family.

For six years they lived happily, having one son and a daughter born.

When one day a man called at the Abbey, and requested to see the baronet.

He was conducted to Gideon in his lady head.

It was that the report of the death of his wife and child was untrue—that she was yet alive, and once at the house of a friend, very ill; and if he desired to see her alive he must come at once.

A servant followed him, and they hastened upon accompanying him to Florence, and they went together.

She returned alone.

TOWN COSSIP.

THE woman of France! How the novelists of that land have reproduced her women, some with brutal flattery, some with mawkish pity, all with what to us seems a disgusting and shameful mixture of degradation from the proud throne she occupies here as Queen of Hearts.

As we read the pages of Victor Hugo we are filled with a sense of the dramatic, how original, in the figure of Esmeralda as she plays at the fountain, or the other prices of romances whose highest illustrator of sainthood was Queen Anne among the mystics of England before the shrine of Our Lady of Loretto. It is the mingling of the sensual and the spiritual in the character, by the French women is most poignant.

But go abroad in France, with a tube Americanizing mind and consciousness above you, look at her surrounded sons who endure him and sighs with mutual weariness. Some swagger offensive has been adopted among them all, and cannot their manliness and sincerity up at the first glance, like a wall built in a net, drunken, but not with wine. In this aspect, woman seems remorseless, pestiferous, corrosive, dragging down with her in her own incomfortable defeat the nation's hope, the really young souls of France. Paris lies, as Paris lay of old, in the lap of Helen, and no thunder of battle can draw him out to the plain of Troy.

Never has any civilization decreed into such a wormhood as that of France. Now intelligent, how vright, sympathetic, inviting, deadly! Years alone you find months that are at the same time gates for wisdom and pitfalls for blood.

A good and noble Frenchwoman is the rose of all the world.

We were looking at a head of such as one at Goupil's the other day. It was by Edouard Frere, Nobody Else, the man who can ask just what price he likes for his portraits in Paris. Dubufe himself, a sexagenarian fellow in patent leathers, can get his palette and his pencil loaded with more than a king's ransom for them, and be splendidly rewarded for the intrusion.

A fifteen-foot Bisbing, painted with perfect art in a natural event. Dubufe paints heads and hands with a perfect touch. He considers that as long as you would think he could paint but those extremities he is safe. The man who can paint a head could now compose a picture, and blow that one like Orpheus. She was a woman we saw but have gazed on in a private house by Mr. George B. Bryant, of Philadelphia. Mr. Bryant has a gallery, every one knows, best in whole painter, called "Spring" and "Autumn."

The portrait attracted us instantly by grappling boldly with what lesser men consider the premise part of their work, and that is—truthfulness in beauty. Once—a fourth-rate man—was afraid of the shadow, and rescued his subject from it, and then, as the face was rescued, has closely imitated the cheek bones, and a picture of Spring—and Spring is an expression of freshness. Hair is brunette, with quiet plaited eyes, clouded belt, and a bosom swelling with the promise of the future. Her hands are clasped away from the crossed temples by a sleeve of lace, and the whole of the treatment is the perfection of simplicity, always the deeper lip is most the picturesque element of a woman's beauty. Let her be with the quiet repose of expression, while never even correct, distracting, provoking, while never even beauty spoil the beautiful, fade the beautiful.

The hands of Dubufe's women are almost terrible like all his other accessories, and with a perfection of physical strength without an effort, they repose or hang at their sides, and are ready to wake and perform their duties with the utmost ease. We have seen these hands most we are the promises; we had rather know a woman's hand than the name of the woman who owns it.

"Her steady eyes," says Oscar Beil, somewhere, "of a dark blue, are fringed with long, dusky eyelashes, her lips are lifted and full of warmth, they trouble with the perfection of the outline of the mouth." That will do if you leave out the "prayer;" that Gothic prayer which is the quintessence of all Christian expression.

But are there really such women in France? Why, a man will and himself painting and painting and really never believe that there is a woman in the world to stand in the day of the late woman of France?

In the Academy of Design, Newman, "Lady Clare at the parchment by Mr. Rogy, was placed on Monday again on the line, and will attract a vast crowd. It is still in retire to a private gallery, and the public will lose one of the best specimens of modern art in America.

We noticed the other day at the running establishment of Mr. Earle, on Broadway, a Dying Gaul, the most serene by G. Perkins. It represents the rocky shores of Crete, with the Dying Gaul in the foreground, and nothing against the crumbling bastion of the rocks, and weeping with the sympathy of the sea-gulls that seek Kansas upon a spar. The whole picture is full of action, and the Dying Gaul, as he falls, points to the wounds in his breast. Several painters who worked away at easels, and they seemed to be copying from the picture, but it was a mistake. The composition in the whole picture is controlled by one master mind, and the copyists were only there to define the story and accommodate the effect.

Mr. Bierstadt, the great exponent of Nature in all the conservatories at Paris has enlisted the numerous lovers of art in the country by collecting his most representative pieces for the organ, carefully figured and not over-colored.

It is of incalculable service to possess the selections of a man who has had experience in so vast a field of creative pieces for the organ, carefully figured and not over-colored.

Lippincott, of Philadelphia, is about to issue a collection of the Lyrical Poems of Alfred Tennyson, and very great interest. It may be that no very immortal poetry has been written in the nineteenth, but we have noticed several that were to say the least very beautiful, and that have become a part of popular song. The publishers have already collected nearly 300 specimens, and have issued a very handsome prospectus of the work.

One of the sights of Greenwich is the "cigar tree" displayed in the new establishment of Mr. Hall, Connolly, at the corner of Howard street—a raw variety of the Havana, and the Key West cigar. Mr. Connolly decided upon the results of the labeled—all of which are of the Havana and Key West cigar manufacture, as they gave upon the miraculous growth, and beyond it the tobacco looked upon as a curiosity.

But we are receiving our pet epicurean this week, the Marquis of Lorne, who will study the artistic and social aspects of the arena, and who, in the miraculous realities of the Coliseum, will be reminded of the old Roman days of Corcoloseum for tearing butchering to pieces, may be the Christians who were thrown to the lions to make breathing in the nineteenth century. The civilization of the world has made a vast improvement since the days of crowded death heads of horses, an undred cats with their tails on fire, and the whole days of the Iron Duke of Wellington, and we have only included that there is no passion at stone to be found in the Coliseum. Now we have the Marquis coming to England, and an endless multitude of noble fronts wearing the dress of the Highlanders. Of course, if they are not to have the dress of knighthood, their action impeded by the kilt, and their powers of locomotion by the dress, the services like use in the arrows erect to hold their feet and their hands to separate stones.

One cannot walk these blocks without witnessing the display of some of these beautiful dresses. The most beautiful young chicks, who appear to pass the day in the most delightful manner, and to spend their time in the most delightful manner, and to spend their time in enjoying life with languid, superior eyes, must been seen to be believed. The most striking thing about the society is the fact that which deprives their faces of the least expression. If they are as cold as stone as a tragic mantle. But the poor animals, is there no one to tell them that they are in the land of liberty, and that no one is under the necessity of being a slave to any sort of influence, who are those accidents before their eyes every day? Let them do this thing on Fifth avenue, and nothing is more than the most needless gravity and waste of walking the streets.

We observe that at the Sun Rise places have undergone their annual alterations, and that it is the thing to do to their pretty legs to the beautiful new saloon-on, 679 Broadway, were they will be found in the most magnificent display. Mesdames Brace have done themselves great credit in the new saloon, and we advise the ladies to the perpetrators ought to build. We have always considered that the Broadway was the most beautiful of the boulevard.

There is nothing very startling to say about these beloveds.

The Winter Garden theatre are playing one romantic drama every night, and on Tuesday "Cora; or the Forsaken Child," by Mr. Hutton Hill. Mrs. Wallack, and Miss Gannon. It is a strong bulgaria to get such a thing for a week, and we have been long enough without a Wallack in the Winter Garden.

At Niblo's they have Maggie Mitchell. Margaret Gaynor is a sweet little shadow, and she and Miss Mitchell's pretty ways are a complete combination. In the new drama which is to be brought out on the evening of the Messrs. Lonn's improvements by the luminosity of the gas, and the whole house will be filled with sunlight, gas-light by the pale moonlight, New moons, new lights, new sunlight and lunacies, new to the moonlight—who, after all, are at the bottom of all our troubles—are to be kept perfect, fragrant and sentimentalists. Then there is to be that recurring wonder of modern inventions, the clearing-out sale, which you lose your gravity and float up to the chimney pots like an enthusiast. Trip the Lebrede, who comes and knows just how to make a guest comfortable, sunshine, pleasant days, and the Lebrede, Long Branch, are a charming family now. Their guests are soon with a perpetual bland smile dressed upon their faces. Fire Island!

SCENE IN THE COURT-ROOM IN THE OLD PENITENTIARY BUILDING, WASHINGTON, D. C., DURING THE TRIAL OF THE CONSPIRATORS, PAINE, ATZEROT, HAROLD, ARNOLD, McLAUGHLIN, MUDD AND SURRATT, BEFORE THE MILITARY COMMISSION.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

A HYMN.

BY HIRAM E. GRIFFITH.

Now God be praised for joyful news,
  The lightning sends to-day,
How it has thrilled our hearts and souls,
  This news from far away;
With gladsome hearts send out a shout,
  And make the walkin ring.
Hurrah! hurrah! 'tis glorious news,
  And 'tis a glorious thing.

Now glory to the God of all,
  Who blessed our arms to-day,
No more o'er ruined Sumpter's walls
  Shall rebel flag display;
And glory to our leaders brave,
  And glory to the men,
And glory to our country,
  When peace shall come again.

Now glory to the land we love,
  For never such a day
Has come to greet our vision,
  Has come to cheer our way;
Well washed has been our starry flag,
  In a long drenching rain,
And now it waves a glorious thing,
  Without a blot or stain.

Thank God that we have lived to see
  That trampled flag upraised
And placed again on Sumter's walls,
  Now God again be praised!
Now Glory to our Generals,
  And glory to our men,
And glory to our country,
  When peace shall come again.

The Night-Express Train:

A STORY TOLD BY A RAILROAD MAN.

IN TWO ACCIDENTS.

THE officer stopped. He had been talking in a rapid, pleasant way, as if, thus far, he had been recalling only the happiest recollections. When he went on again, a sadness fell upon his voice, he talked much slower and more earnestly, as if though accustomed to speak lightly of crime and criminals, when affecting other people, he was touched, like a man when it concerned a friend of his.

"Did I say that Milton was a school-mate of mine? He was more than that. He was a dear friend, to whom I owe my present position. Shall I go on?"

"Yes—do," I said. "You have only just commenced. Let me know the whole matter."

"Milton took the matter much to heart, at first. It was said that his brain was touched, that there was danger of its unsettling his reason. But when it was all over, and he had the courage to look it square in the face, he came out all right, stronger, I thought, than before. He didn't go moping about, as if all of his earthly hopes had been blasted—nor take to drink—as many a poor wretch here, but took a straight-forward course, with his head up, attending to his business, as if be was contented. And more than contented now. For he lost that careworn, hesitating air, that he had always had, that seemed to betray an anxiety, lest he should do something to displease somebody.

"You know that it seems as if misery and sorrow like best to drop down where there is most of happiness. Adam and Eve were not long in Paradise before the devil came. Like that ancient couple, to all the outer world, seemed Mr. and Mrs. Weyant. He was more than comfortably well-to-do, as far as money goes. He was sole owner of a large match factory at the foot of the hill, that paid him, what, for the country, was a princely income. She was in the height of her beauty—tasty, loved to dress, and had all of her whims and caprices more than gratified. To look at her face, said to be the surest index of one's daily life, no one could discover any evidence, except those that betokened the most complete connubial happiness. Milton and she—they were sociable beings, and had always moved in the same circle—met very often. But between them, there was only that distant, polite intercourse which a bachelor is allowed to hold with a married female friend. For almost two years they were no more to each other than any other two people of opposite sexes, who met frequently at neighbor's houses, and sit down together at hospitable boards. At about that time Milton's attentions had become very pointed towards a beautiful little creature, in every way worthy of him. And the rumor—I knew that he was to marry her—had a much stronger foundation than the usual gauzy guess-work of gossips. After it had become definitely determined that such was really to be the case, those that knew Milton began to see a change in him. As for myself, I could see that the snaffle-bit had once more been thrown upon him, and that the rein was being pulled tighter and tighter, and that he felt it too sensibly for a man of any true spirit.

"It was not long, and you know how quickly a bad smell circulates through the air, before people began to cut Mrs. Weyant, to leave her out from their invitations, and to say that she was too much with Milton. She had no business to be quite so intimate. Nothing good could come from it. For although society sometimes winks at such an infraction of its discipline when there is gold to dim the sight, Mrs. Weyant's independence and seeming utter contempt for its usages, gradually alienated from her all of her best friends who believed her in all respects to be innocent, and who would always have proudly and willingly stood up in her defence.

"But there was another motive for the ill-opinion of all. The two were never mentioned together, without an allusion, besides, to the poor, frail creature, the delicate bud, whom Milton had faithlessly deserted in the height of her happy expectations, and who withered and died with a disappointed, broken heart, who laid her head upon her mother's bosom, and with the name of the man she loved upon her lips, passed away from a bad world, that she thought all deceit, into a purer place, where she hoped to find only purity and truth. Was it Milton's fault? He had been brought again under a mysterious influence that had controlled him his whole life-time, and was in a condition so natural, that be seemed to have no wish, even if he had had the power, to break it off. If one can have no sympathy with him for being so weak, what can be the feeling towards her who was so wicked?

"It was only a little more than two years after the marriage of Mr. Weyant that an end came to all of this. He had been making preparations to go to Europe for a long visit. He came originally from Scotland, and thither he intended to take his wife. He went. But as regarded her, he altered his original plans. She was left behind, a disgraced, deserted wife, abandoned by all the good, except Milton. Nothing left, except her magnificent beauty, her impetuous heart and her sin. I have his word for it, that she came to him after it was all over—came to him suddenly and unawares, as if a ghost—when he was alone in his room. He expected some violence. Said as much, and rang the bell for a servant. But she only laughed at his fears, and said to him, fiercely, and with wild eyes, 'You have been my ruin—you have made my life a vast waste of wretchedness. I will make the wretched remnant of yours a hell!'

"She said no more, but glided noiselessly from the room and from the house. For as much of his life, as has already passed, although we have no means of openly convicting her of anything, except of her last fearful act, she has mournfully succeeded."

Thus far, as the voluble, wiry, quick-eyed man went on, I felt my sympathies all gradually dying out for the pale-faced creature sleeping—how could she sleep?—so quietly in my car. I had regarded her as one who had been driven into a distasteful marriage, and who, goaded by wrongs heaped upon her, such as only women can know, and which a man would not endure, and unwilling to wait for death to release her, had taken the matter in her own hands and fled. Out of the way of her melting eye and pleading tones, I had forgotten the influence of the one and the fascination of the other. My pity and determination to shield and protect, which had had such a rapid conception and birth, were as rapidly dying out, and once more came those two impressions into my mind which had come with the first sight of her — the picture of Delilah and the serpent-charmer's music.

"After Mr. Weyant's departure"—I had not interrupted him, he had only stopped to change his position—"she left the city, and shortly after Milton followed her. All three did not go in the same direction, although their return was nearly simultaneous. And what a life she led! Magnificent misery! I heard of her in some of the Western cities. She played upon the stage, and her great beauty attracted multitudes to admire her person more than to applaud her art. But her life was a sham. From house to house, from city to city, she passed like a meteor, that flashes with a lurid, unhealthy glare, and drops at length into the darkest darkness. Down, down, she went that inevitable descent, and when she returned she was a wretched creature indeed. No longer Gertie, playful name of innocence and beauty, but 'White Gert,' vulgar from its shortness, and expressive of the dead paleness that even brandy had no effect upon.

"She could never have returned save for one purpose:

"Mr. Weynant, as if to tempt misfortune, brought back with him a buxom-looking Scotch woman for a wife. He seemed to have succeeded admirably in consoling himself for his first unfortunate marriage. He looked jolly and rotund, at ease with himself and the whole world. And with him there came, as he stepped upon the platform of the station on his arrival, a chubby little lad of some four or five years, on every feature of whose face was indelibly stamped Weyant. In the arm, too, of a servant behind them reposed easily an infant, bearing equally undubitable marks of its parentage.

"Though I had known Milton and Gertie for a long time, never until now had I been called upon to know them professionally. They were suspicious characters, half-way vagrants, and I must keep an eye upon them. With deep sorrow and more as a preventative did I do this. I am very thankful that, wretched as Milton had become—for he, too, had been dragged down so low with her, that not a spark of the spirit of manhood was in him—I am very thankful that be was never a criminal. Alas! that ever I should be obliged to arrest, as one guilty of a crime, a school-boy friend, who had oftentimes caressed me and always stood as my protector. I am sure, had such a thing ever become necessary, I would leave the force sooner than have another officer witness his degradation. Only get her out of the way once, and we can redeem Milton. Nothing else will do it.

"Then followed a series of remarkable misfortunes to Mr. Weyant—remarkable for their completeness, the impossibility of discovering their origin, and the rapidity of their occurrence. His match factory was burned to the ground; this alone was not strange, for it was a large wooden building, far outside the city limits. The engines with difficulty reached it, and then only to find it a blaze that was the quickest exhausted from the combustible materials of which it was composed that increased its fierceness. In less than a week afterwards his dwelling-house was destroyed. Neither of these, taken separately, were singular; but together, were ominous, and in answer to the first inquiry as to who were Mr. Weyant's enemies, Milton and Gertie were hauled up. They lived far away in a distant and low part of the city, and nothing could be proved against them. In fact, it appeared that neither of them, since their return, had been anywhere near the scene of either conflagration. I know, as well as I know that there is such a place as China, though not from my own knowledge, that both of these buildings were burned by the help of a human hand, and that hand was Gertie's; but it reaches through such deep darkness that I cannot pierce its way. Light must fall upon it one of these days.

"Then came a double blow: One sunny afternoon, not three months since, the tall, raw-boned Scotch nurse had taken Mrs. Weyant's children down on the river slope, to catch the cool breeze from the water, and amuse them in their play. After a time she had some help. A youth, such an one as go about the streets, and are as difficult to recognise or distinguish in a crowd, as to find a particular grain of wheat in a bag, who was so shabbily and yet fantastically dressed as to excite the loud laughter of the elder Weyant boy, came rolling and tumbling about the grass. He stood upon his head and walked about upon his hands, turned summersaults and cart-wheels, until even the baby in the nurse's arms crowed with delight. Exhausted with feats that would have done honor to any sawdust ring, the youth leaned himself up against one of the large trees near by, took a remarkably long piece of candy from his pocket, and after regarding it complacently for a moment, began sucking it, with a gusto that started the envy of the young Weyant, meanwhile leering at them all from under the broken forepiece of his cap with that perfectly-at-ease air that is so consonant with childhood, whether in rags or in silks, but most particularly in rags.

"Young Weyant's desire to be partaker in the seeming bliss enjoyed by the stranger allowed him not a moment's rest until his object was fatally accomplished. He made regular approaches, advanced with his hand behind his back, and then retreated rapidly and in good order towards the nurse. Advancing again as if approaching a member of a ferocious and hostile nation, and retreating again to the cover of nurse's plentiful skirts. All the while, the animated tatter, stood back up against the tree, with one leg carelessly crossed over the other, one hand in his pocket, and the other holding the remarkable piece of candy. Always with the same satisfied leer upon his face. At last, the succulent sugar growing larger and larger and sweeter and sweeter in the eyes and imagination of young Weyant, he made one bold push, overcame all fear, and marching up to the wretched vagrant, still holding one hand behind him, he put out another in a manner that could not be mistaken. The vagrant never smiled, nor lost his unpleasant leer, but taking his hand from his pocket, and looking at what it contained with a regretful gaze offered it to young Weyant. It was the counterpart of the piece that seemed to be so delightful. It was eagerly seized and borne in triumph towards nurse, while the vagrant with a yell that would have done no discredit to a wild Indian, turned three or four summersaults, and disappeared among the trees and rapidly gathering shades of night.

"Nurse arose slowly to go home. It was very quiet; scarcely a footfall could be heard anywhere on the slope. Suddenly, as she tells it, from behind one of the trees, there darted a tall, dark man, who jostled rudely up against her as if he might be intoxicated. In the midst of her alarm and agitation, and as quick as thought, he snatched the babe from her arms, and was gone. Which way he went, or even a slight description of him she was too much agitated to notice or give. Her screams of terror soon brought about her a crowd, who, disinterested beings! thought her more drunk than injured, for in the agony of her fright, with her apron tossed over her head she could say nothing but:

"'They're stown him awa; they're stown him awa," wringing her hands in the wildness of her despair.'

"The misery of Mr. Weyant's household was doubled during the night, for while he and his wife were still awake, eagerly watching with sore hearts for some tidings of the lost one, the eldest crept quietly into the room, saying that he couldn't sleep, and wanted to be rocked in his mama's lap. He kissed them both and softly laid himself across his mother's arms. Wishing for the one that was gone, never to return, and too sad, even to hum even a motherly tune, Mrs. Weyant noticed no change, at first in the little one whom she held. Disturbed at length by the perfect composure of all its limbs, she put her lips to his.

"The little one was dead!

"The poison in the candy had worked silently, but none the less rapidly nor surely.

"Is the torment of the wicked worse than what Mr. Weyant suffered?

"Not one, not two, but scores of vagabond boys have been submitted to the inspection of the Scotch nurse. But it has avaded nothing. No clue has yet been discovered. And the chagrin felt by our folks at this complete baffling of their energies, I think, makes one less likely to be discovered. Sometimes we begin at the wrong end. I would have begun, if I had had my way, with shutting up 'White Gert.'

"Such a display of fiendish malignity seemed to render the mover of it a satisfaction for some months. But one more stroke was left to complete the poor man's misery. He is a very charitable man, and last evening, with a carlessness that was almost criminal, he was down in the obscure and wretched part of the city. His wife was with him, hoping perhaps to gain some tidings of her lost child, or to assuage her own deep grief, by alleviating the misfortunes of others. They stayed late at the bedside of a poor dying country-woman of theirs, and it was not till after the gas was lit in the streets, that they started on their homeward way, to meet what they very little expected. A man and woman blocked the way in a narrow path, and Weyant turned to step into the gutter to pass them. The woman grasped him fiercely by the shoulder and looked at him a moment, so savagely, that her face nearly touched his. She laughed a bitter laugh, and with an oath, cried out:

"'No, you don't, old man. We'll settle our little affair right here, and immediately. Your time has passed, now mine has come.'

"There was a slight struggle between the strange man and woman, only a brief one, in which time, Weyant pushed hard to get away. Mrs. Weyant saw the flash of a pistol-barrel, protruding from underneath the woman's shawl, threw herself, with a loud shriek for help upon her husband's breast—the pistol was exploded, and the ball, entering Mrs. Weyant's shoulder, cut clean through to her breast. The strange man seemed horrified, threw his companion from him and ran rapidly up the street. The woman pitched the exploded pistol into the gutter, folded her arms about her bosom, looked a moment and walked haughtily away. The terror of Mr. Weyant, and the very critical condition of his wife, enabled him only to shout for help, and pay no attention to the way which the attempted murderers had fled. But he caught one full glimpse of her face; and it was Gertie Weyant's!'"

I know very well, that for a moment, I stared ghastly and frightened at the officer, for he caught me by the arm, and said that the narration affected me strangely, or was I weak and sick?

I was guilty.

Trembling, I arose to my feet.

"Come, come," I whispered, for my voice had died away in my throat, and I seemed to hear the voice of some one else speaking. Come. What have I escaped doing? Come with me. Hurry. She is nearer than you think!"

He shook my hand from his shoulder roughly, all the while, keeping his eye steadily fixed on mine. He seemed alarmed, and O'Neil leaned forward in the glimmer of the car, and spoke my name, as if he were awaking one from the nightmare.

"What's the matter with the man?" said the officer.

Was the fright upon all of us, only a premonition of what was coming?

On the still echoes around about, a dreadful prolonged shriek burst from the steam-whistle. A cry of warning and fate—a scream as if made by a gigantic human creature in the intensest agony. O'Neil grasped his lantern, and tried to peer out from the window into the impenetrable darkness about us. All in the car sprang to their feet; we heard the click of the whirling braker on the bumpers. And then, in an instant, in the twinkling of an eye, there came a great, horrible crash, and rumbling and tearing, as if the earth was being torn in pieces. With it, and far above the din and turmoil, the cry of passengers or the shivering of bolts, there was one long, quivering shriek, and then, for a moment, the silence was oppressive. The long busy train lay a helpless, quiet mass of ruins. O'Neil was still on his feet, and asked if we were hurt.

"Not a bit," I cried, which was echoed by the officer.

We sprang out into the darkness to see the extent of the damage, and to extricate our passengers from the wreck. It was bitter, bitter cold, and we were in the midst of the mountains, where no one ever thought of living. The groans of the passengers, and the cries of suddenly awaked children were doubly wretched sounds to hear in that gloomy spot. One after another, the uninjured, shaking themselves with a glad sort of surprise, clambered out. A huge fire was built, and about it we all clustered to count up the broken bones. They were not many. There were severe bruises, and some fearful scratches, but out of the whole train of passengers not one was seriously injured. It began to take the shape of an hysterical joke, as we all crept close up the fire, preparing to wait with a commendable patience, the coming of the day or the next train.

Wait! and as I thought of it, I started as if I had been stung. In the excitement of the moment I had forgotten all about her. Where was she? With shaking limbs I made my way towards what had been the baggage-car. One each side of the track lay trunks and bags and valises, with their contents scattered here and there, and nearest the fire, sat a dainty youth, cursing to find his valise burst open, his linen soiled—and his life saved! The frost had heaved up and loosened the track, and for several rods the engine had ploughed up the rails, and at length dug into the ground and stopped. On had driven the baggage-car, climbing over the tender, forced by the forward passenger-car off from the tracks, and held firmly in an upright position. The bottom I saw had been torn out, and the empty box stared towards the glimmering fire.

O'Neil had been to the engine to assure himself of its utter uselessness, and the safety of the engineer. He was coming slowly back, shaking his lantern in his hand.

As I came up with him, the officer, with a frightened look in his face, had grasped his arm and staring upward, was pointing at the top of the baggage-car that loomed up like the black tower of some ill-omened fortress. Close beside it, lowering away above it, so that its shadow fell directly across it, with its one solitary branch pointing down at its shattered frame, ominous of dreadful things, stood a blackened, charred tree.

"See, see," whispered the officer; "what is that dark thing up there, swaying in the air?"

O'Neil held up his lantern. I could tell by the blanched look on his face that it was something terrible, but I did not dare to raise my eyes. Weak from my agitation and fright, from the physical memory of my former hurt, and from a dread of I knew not what, I sank down at their feet in a swoon.

It was long afterwards, after I had left the road for good, that I could explain the matter—as far as my own presumed guilt was concerned—and when I did, I learned that a woman had been hung by her most luxuriant hair. That that ominous door of the conductor's office had caught the rich heavy strands in its grasp, had latched itself, and held her firmly to her death.

IN MEMORIAM. A. L.

Gone where the angels are singing
In the light of eternal day;
Gone to join the angels are smiling,
High over the starry way;
Gone where the throngs of spiritual
Groups irrigate the hale shores,
Far away from earth's red passion,
To the realms of endless love.

He may bless the hand that sent him
(Through sad, mysterious ways),
To be freed from cares wrod-laden,
In this weary land below;
Yet we crave the hand that robbed us
Of the soul of his beaming eye,
And not death's darkest night seal
With a mantle of darker dye.

The big world's breast is heaving
With a weight that none may say;
And its eyes are cold and joyless
As the clamy shroud to-day;
And its heart is beating sadly,
As the sombret of a funeral bell,
For he was one of his betting
While rending the chains of hell.

Gull-winged commerce, crape thy pinning;
Turret deep thy silky hue;
Sullen cannon, speak the morning;
Gbstening harrow, spurn the plough;
For the land is filled with gladness,
City, hamlet, valley, hill,
Now are hushed as summer twilight,
And its heart is still.

River glide through the weeping willows,
And moan on your winding way;
For you'll miss his voice, aye, sadly,
When your current wavelets play;
Ocean, spread in trackless grandeur,
Neath the dome of the spring-time sky
Rid your rocking on the night wind,
When the rushing storm is nigh.

Thunder, growl from your airy cloud home
That the nation's pride is fled;
Lightning, blaze your darkest hue,
For mine's best brother's dead;
May dews, fall in pearly beauty,
Lightly on the grass that soon sleeps,
For he smiles from above on a morning people,
And o'er his country a good guard keeps.

His name will blaze in the roll of story,
And a page in history all bright and fair,
How he nobly fought in the cause of Freedom,
And in the cause of Freedom fell.

CHAPTER XXIII.—CONTINUED.

Time all-absorbing passion called love was a sorrowful thing then, he thought, let it seem to whom it would, a one-sided frenzy, a perpetual sacrifice, a self-imposed immolation.

"Poor, poor child! I am sure my cousin," he said to Miss Banks. "You cannot imagine how anxious I am to hear of her."

"I am sure she and me was always the best of friends," answered the fair Jemima, with a touch of diplomacy, "and I am sure I did think of taking the apartments, me and mother would do all in our power to make you comfortable, if it was only on account of Miss Lucy; for she was one of the sweetest young creatures I ever know. She stayed with us three weeks before she was married, and I never shall forget her pretty face the day she first came up from the country after the lodgings had been took for her."

"Mr. Lesley stopped the lodgings, I suppose?"

"No, it was Mr. Lesley's brother."

"Oh, he had a brother, then?"

"Yes, he brother was something in the law, I think—a very nice gentleman, and almost the living image of Mr. Lesley himself."

"Can you give me a description of Mr. Lesley? I never saw him, and I want very much to know what kind of man he is."

Miss Banks hesitated for some moments.

"It's so difficult to give an exact description of any one," she said. "Mr. Lesley was a tall, handsome-looking man, with fair hair and blue eyes. I don't think I could describe him any nearer than that."

Francis Tredethlyn sighed. There are so many tall, handsome-looking men with fair hair and blue eyes; and it is chiefly in melodrama that people go about the world conveniently marked with a strong personal description.

"Answer me one question," said Francis, eagerly, "before you tell me the rest of my cousin's history. I want to know where she is now."

Miss Banks shook her head, and sighed despondently.

"No more than you do, sir," she exhaimed. "It's ten years and a half ago since I set eyes upon Miss Lesley, and I don't know no more than the dead what's become of her since."

"Then she is as much lost to me to-day as she was yesterday," said Francis, sadly. "But you can at least tell me all you know of my poor cousin. It may help me to some clue by which to find her."

Jemima was evidently a good-natured girl. She begged Mr. Tredethlyn to be seated, and placed herself opposite to him.

"I'll call mother if you like," she said, "but I think I can tell you more about Mr. Lesley; mother is such a one to wander, and when one's annoue to know anything quick, it don't do to have to deal with a person whose mind's always harping upon lodgers and their ways. Of course everybody knows lodgers are tiresome, and nobody lets apartments for pleasure, and nobody would pay taxes if they could help it, and poor rates are not expected to raise people's spirits; but if facts are disagreeable, that's no reason you should keep thinking and grumbling on in every style of conversation. Till now it used to be a relief to me to come and sit with Mrs. Lesley of an evening, and hear her troubles if it was only for the sake of a change."

"I thank you heartily for having been good to my cousin," Francis Tredethlyn said, earnestly. He was thinking that he would drop into a jeweler's shop on his way homeward, and choose the handsomest diamond ring in the man's stock for Miss Jemima Banks.

"I don't know as I deserve any thanks, sir" answered the girl. "I could like talking to Mrs. Lesley, and I couldn't help feeling for her when I saw how sorry-ashamed and sad Mr. Lesley treated her. He never had her husband come back to her, and when he did come her baby was born, and there was the two of them in the room just as you're sitting, and she seemed as if she couldn't make enough of me child."

"A child!" repeated Francis. "Mrs. Burfield never told me of the child."
